GREAT SILK SALE.
The largest, best, and cheapest stock ever yet submitted in this city.
The shipment to which we have to-day the honour of inviting the attention of the public is in all respects MOST EXTRAORDINARY.
The circumstances connected with the purchase of this UNRIVALLED PARCEL have been unusually favourable for us, and the advantages we now offer to purchasers have never before been approached.
The following catalogue will serve to show something of this ENORMOUS PURCHASE, and some guarantee—albeit, unnecessary—of the genuineness of our Mr. FARMER'S EFFORTS IN LONDON.
We now beg to announce our intention to hold during the remainder of this month and October a SPECIAL and EXTRAORDINARY SALE of NEW SILKS, consequent upon an unusual purchase by our London partner (in conjunction with one of the largest houses in New York) of the ENTIRE STOCK of an eminent Lyons manufacturer, the gross value being one and a half million of francs, equal to £60,000 sterling, the half of which comes to Victoria House. This grand purchase embraces every article now in high fashion. Every piece is guaranteed this season's manufacture, and bought at a discount of 17½ per cent., the full benefit of which we have determined to give to purchasers at our first SILK SALE.

THE "MORESQUE."—We are introducing a truly splendid Carpet, to be known by this name. It has been manufactured and registered by one of the most successful manufacturers in Europe, and is calculated to create no small sensation in Australia; even as it is creating in the home markets. Its chief line of beauty consists in the introduction of threads of cloth of gold worsted, intricately woven into the ground of the carpet, and giving a novel and beautiful appearance to the designs, which are, independently, chaste and recherché. We are now opening some hundred of patterns, each a picture in itself, and invite the inspection of every carpet-buyer.

NOTICE TO THE LADIES OF SYDNEY AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC.

E. FRENCH, of French's Cheap Boot Mart, 661, George-street, while thanking his customers for the liberal support heretofore awarded him, desires to inform them that he intends finally retiring from business as soon as he can clear out the whole of his varied and extensive stock; and, in order to effect this speedily, he has made sweeping and unparalleled reductions in every line, so that anyone requiring boots can now obtain a first-class article at less than wholesale rates. French's stock of English Boots are all of thoroughly reliable makes, and will be sold at such prices that no single line can possibly be replaced. Therefore families are invited to come early, and see for themselves the bargains offered.

As this is a genuine clearing sale, and E. French is desirous of selling off as quickly as possible, his well-known Colonial Boots, unequalled for wear, perfect fitting, and capitally made, have also been considerably reduced, so that now these first-class boots are within the reach of anyone—for everything must positively be sold.

PARLIAMENT OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, October 5.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

Mr. LACKEY, in reply to Mr. Vaughn, said he had no objection to state the approximate value of all the Public buildings in New South Wales, and the probable sum of money that would be required to pay the premium for insuring the same at current rates, but considerable time would be required to furnish the information asked, if considered necessary.

Mr. LACKEY, in reply to Mr. Abigail, said the distance and fares charged upon the trams from King-street station to other stations was as follows:—King-street to Woollahra, distance 2 miles 75 chains, fare by ticket 3d.; ditto Waverley, 4 miles, ditto 4d.; ditto Waterloo, 2 miles 78 chains, ditto 2d.; ditto Newtown, 3 miles, ditto 3d.; ditto Forest Lodge, 2 miles 40 chains, ditto 3d.; ditto Glebe Point, 2 miles 65 chains, ditto 3d.

Sir HENRY PARKES, in reply to Mr. Abigail, said he was not in a position to undertake to bring in a Civil Service Bill at the present time.

Mr. LACKEY, in reply to Mr. M'Elhone, said that 10 men had been tram conductors for 24 months, and these were getting increased pay by virtue of length of service.

Mr. LACKEY, in reply to Mr. M'Elhone for Mr. Copeland, said that tenders for a courthouse at Uralla had been invited, to be opened on the 31st instant.

Sir HENRY PARKES, in reply to Mr. M'Elhone, who asked,—Is it a fact that the Government, or any member of it, recommended or suggested in any way or to any one that the honour of knighthood should be conferred on Sir (then Mr.) Saul Samuel, or that they were, or that any of them was, in any way privy or a party to any such recommendation, or instrumental in obtaining the honour for the Agent-General? said: I might answer this question with one word, no; but I should be sorry for any answer I give to be held to imply that the Government in any way whatever disapprove of the distinction conferred on Mr. Samuel. So far as I have knowledge, I may add, that while in London I read a letter from Lord Kimberley to Sir Saul (then Mr.) Samuel, in which he was asked whether it would be agreeable to him to accept the honour of a K.C.M.G., in which case Lord Kimberley would have much pleasure in recommending him to the Queen. I may say for myself that I know no person in New South Wales more worthy of the distinction.

Dr. RENWICK, in reply to Mr. Day for Mr. Cass, said the road from Warren to Coonamble passes through Crown land, and he was informed that action was now being taken by the Department of Lands towards the withdrawal from lease of the land embraced by the road.

Sir JOHN ROBERTSON, in reply to Mr. Day for Mr. Cass, said the design for the town of Nyngan had not been approved, and therefore the sale of town allotments could not take place. There would be no unnecessary delay.

Mr. LACKEY, in reply to Mr. T. R. Smith, said that no petition had been received from guards on the Western railway asking for the redress of certain grievances. He also said, in reply to the same hon. member, that it would be impracticable to fix any hard and fast rule with regard to the hours worked by the engine-drivers and firemen on the Western railway. Sixty hours per week was the recognised standard, but efforts had been made to reduce them below that number. He also gave other information with regard to the locomotive workmen on the same railway.

Mr. LACKEY, in reply to Mr. Cooke, said it was reported in the public press that a meeting in the interests of the Irish Land League was held in the Hall of the Bathurst School of Arts on Thursday, the 21st day of September last. The hall is erected on land granted by the Government for a School of Arts. The trustees or committee of the Bathurst School of Arts have received a subsidy from the Government for the erection of the buildings in the proportion of £1 for every £2 obtained by cash subscriptions. Similar information with regard to the Orange School of Arts was given.

Mr. LACKEY, in reply to Mr. Kerr, said the railway officials on the Western line, who were paid a daily rate, were allowed overtime payment for Sunday work; those on fixed salaries were allowed holidays at convenient times.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

Mr. Speaker reported the receipt of messages from his Excellency the Governor, conveying the Royal assent to the Summary Convictions and the Barristers' Admission Bills.

FOREST LODGE ESTATE BILL.

Mr. TRECE moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorise the sale of certain Lands and hereditaments conveyed upon certain trusts mentioned and declared in a certain indenture, dated the 1st day of May, 1866, and made between George Slocombe of the first part, Eliza Simons of the second part, and Charles Newman and John Simons of the third part, and to enable the trustees thereof to invest the proceeds of such sale for the persons entitled under such deed, and for other purposes in this Act mentioned.

Mr. Trece brought in the Forest Lodge Estate Bill, and it was read the first time.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART AND FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY.

Sir HENRY PARKES said that the notice which he begged to move—

Mr. A. STUART interrupted the hon. gentleman, and said he could not think that the hon. member was in earnest in going on with such an important matter after giving so little notice.

Sir HENRY PARKES, resuming, said he begged to move—"1. That this House approves of the site lately occupied by the Garden Palace being set apart and appropriated as the site for a National Gallery of Art. 2. That this House approves of a suitable portion of the land now occupied by the Benevolent Asylum and the residence of the Inspector-General of Police, in Pitt-street South, being set apart and appropriated as the site of a Free Public Library. 3. That competitive designs for both edifices be invited from all the Australasian colonies, and that the designs shall provide for an elevation by dome or tower, which shall form a conspicuous object of attraction in the approaches to the city from the sea on the one side and by land on the other. 4. That the designs adopted by the Government, with an estimate of cost, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament for the term of one calendar month before any contract is entered into for the erection of the said edifices. 5. That, subject to the foregoing conditions, and the appropriation of money for the purpose, the erection of both edifices shall be commenced and carried out to completion with the least possible delay." He said in bringing the questions involved in those resolutions before the notice of Parliament, and as he thought the questions raised were of a nature to demand the impartial consideration of all sides of the House, he would address himself to them on their merits as the questions presented themselves to the minds of the Government, and he would endeavour to avoid importing any extraneous matter into the discussion. He trusted that they would be able to consider those resolutions in view of the very important issues which they raised, and that they would not be embarrassed by any other matter, but would have a calm, fair, and rational consideration at the hands of Parliament. He would only allude to the destruction of the Garden Palace just so far as to point out that it was no new thing for a great fire to spring up in a great city: that fires of the most devastating character, the origin of which had been completely concealed from discovery, had devastated great buildings, even buildings of a most permanent character, and laid waste in some instances large districts in cities. He would only allude to one or two. About 20 years ago a fire broke out in Southwark, and in a short time destroyed property to the value of £2,000,000 sterling. The people of that part of London did not sit down and go into lamentations over that great calamity, but at once put their shoulders to the wheel to restore that part of the city which had been laid waste. About 10 years ago a fire broke out in a city of America—Chicago—and in a short time carried away nearly the whole city, destroying property with one fell sweep of fire to the value of £60,000,000 sterling, or about 300,000,000 dollars; but Chicago in the space of 10 years had become the most progressive State in all the United States of America. It had not only been rebuilt, but been rebuilt in a most substantial and handsome manner, and there were now new streets with piles of most substantial buildings in the place. He might point out one other case which occurred in our own city. When St. Mary's Cathedral—a building as little likely to be destroyed by fire as any in the whole city—was swept away by the devastating element, our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens did not sit quiet under that calamity, but at once put their shoulder to the wheel to build a more magnificent structure. And so in scores, and he might say in hundreds, of other cases had a similar thing occurred, and that, then, was the reason he lost no time in bringing this matter before the House—that we, a British community, perfectly able to take care of ourselves, should at once show to our own people, and to the world, that we were in no way intimidated by that great calamity, but on the contrary were prepared to restore, and yet not to restore that very building, but to create for the people of this country another structure in place of that which had been destroyed, and which, no one could doubt, the people highly prized. The Government had thought it better to bring that matter forward at once, and in determining upon that course thought it right at the same time to deal with the question of the Free Public Library. (Hear, hear.) That question had, from one unhappy cause and another, been postponed from time to time in a way so that nothing had really been done. [Sir John Robertson: Hear, hear.] The Government now asked Parliament to sanction the erection of that library, and he hoped he would be able to show that they had very good grounds for asking Parliament to give its sanction to that in the way now proposed. [Mr. Farnell: It was sanctioned 20 years ago.] Well, the hon. member was much to blame that it had not been erected. [Mr. Reid: How much has the Colonial Secretary done towards bringing that about?] That was not the question. He desired to proceed without interruption, and he could assure the hon. gentleman that he would not interrupt him. Now, he might say at once that the Government of this country as now existing drew a very wide distinction between the purposes of an Art Gallery and a Public Library; and they could not concur in the opinion entertained in some quarters that those institutions ought to be together or under the same roof. The Government thought that the purposes of one were in no way on a level with the purposes of the other. It might be wrong to say that there was any want of harmony between the two institutions, but he thought he would be able to point out how very different were the purposes served by each institution. A gallery filled with works of art, paintings, and great works of sculpture was a thing, first, and in a most special way, for the use of art students; secondly, and in a degree much less definite, for the general public. So far as the general public were concerned, the object of one of the institutions was to refine the feelings, to educate the tastes, to bring out a love of the beautiful. For that purpose it was very desirable that any palace erected for the public, in which were to be stored art treasures, should be surrounded by objects of beauty. We had, then, in the site of the late building—the Garden Palace—one of the most glorious sites that could be found on the face of the earth—(hear, hear)—where persons going for the sole purpose of being educated in the love of the beautiful might approach a building amidst objects of beauty. We had there—perhaps it would be wrong for him to say one of the finest botanical gardens in the world, but certainly one of the most beautiful in the world, and one richly stored with choice and rare plants and trees; one so situated for its surroundings that it would be almost impossible to imagine any place more beautiful than the gardens we possessed. A building for the purposes of art, for art study, for art enjoyment, on the crown of the grounds above these gardens, would be in such just harmony with the gardens, and the gardens and surrounding grounds would be in such just harmony with it, that the one would serve the purpose of the other, and add to all the enjoyment and all the culture for which this Art Gallery was erected. But that was not the case with the Library. A library was visited for the purposes of study either within its archives for for taking books for recreation and study at home. In either case it was not desirable that there should be objects of external beauty to be looked at. He did not say that would be a drawback, but it was not desirable so far as the Library was concerned. Persons who went into a library, if they went with an earnest purpose—to make themselves acquainted with the thoughts and the reasonings of the dead and the immortal—did not want their attention distracted by outward objects, and this was so proved that no gentleman of large means who understood the purposes of a library ever placed his library in that part of his building most conspicuous for outside objects. So it was in the case of all the great libraries of the world. The great libraries of the world were not situated outside the city where persons could see objects of beauty, but they were placed in such central situations as enabled the population to have ready access to them. Take any of the libraries within our own knowledge. Take that of the British Museum the greatest we possessed as a nation—that library was in the very centre of London. Take the library of the neighbouring city of Melbourne. That was very fairly in the centre of the population, and was more completely so when it was erected. Any hon. gentleman who had visited the library in Melbourne must have noticed the scores of respectable men—men belonging to the mechanic classes, to the digging class, or to the agricultural class—who were buried in the recesses of the library in deep study of the books they went there to examine. They were not looking out of the window at trees or other objects of external beauty, but were engaged in the study which for the time was of all importance to their mind. So in the library of the British Museum and in all the great libraries of the world. The one end was for purposes of study, the other simply for the purpose, so far as the mass of the people were concerned, of gratifying a taste for the beautiful, and study so far as art studies were concerned. Having now tried to explain the difference which the Government considered existed between those two institutions, he now came to deal with the resolutions. He had already pointed out how extremely suitable the site of the late Garden Palace was for the National Gallery of Art, a gallery to be filled in the course of time with valuable paintings and sculptures, and other works of high art; and he now came to the second resolution, which asked Parliament to approve of the site near the railway station, which was well known to all hon. members, for the Free Public Library. The Government had selected that site for reasons which he thought would be obvious to the people of this country. (Hear, hear.) They said a public library ought not to be erected on the edge of the city. (Hear, hear.) They said it ought not to be erected to suit the views of those who least wanted the use of it (hear, hear)—that it ought not to be erected for the mere adornment of some part of the city. But they said it ought to be erected in consideration for the whole of the population of this great city; and to enable the working people, the persons of limited means, but the most in need of access to this library, to have free and easy access to it in order that they might derive in full all its advantages, it ought to be in the very midst of the population. (Hear, hear.) Let them take a map of Sydney, and see where this noble site was situated, for the site of the Benevolent Asylum was one of the noblest in our city. (Hear, hear.) It was open, elevated, and in every way worthy of a great national building. Take a map of the city. Run out to the eastward, and you would see Woolloomooloo, Woollahra, Surry Hills, Paddington,—all the eastern suburbs which were fast filling up, and would carry the city to the waters of the Pacific. On the western side were Pyrmont, The Glebe, North Annandale, Leichhardt, and Camperdown, which were also fast filling up and becoming miles and miles of houses and people. Run south and you had the railway suburbs, which in the course of a very few years would join Sydney with Parramatta. On the north you had the whole of the city, and you had Balmain and St. Leonards; and, taking these things into consideration, it would seem that the site which the Government had selected was in the very heart of the growing population of this great metropolis. We were not to erect these public edifices in view of to-day or of 20 years hence, but we were to erect them in view of the wants of succeeding generations. We were not to look to the city which contained, with the suburbs, some 200 odd thousand people, but we were to look at this metropolis when its population would be a million of people, and we could then see clearly enough that the site he had selected, which had been approved by the Government, and which he felt assured this Parliament would approve, was the most central that could be obtained within the area of this growing population. He had indicated in the resolution, roughly he admitted, but sufficiently for the House to understand, that these buildings ought to be of such a structure and of such architectural pretensions as to be an adornment to the city. No one who belonged to Sydney had ever approached it from the sea since the Garden Palace was erected who had not dwelt in admiration on the appearance of that noble building. He was quite sure that every one who heard him would admit that the appearance of the Garden Palace from the sea was a great adornment to the city. (Cheers.) The Government thought so, and they asked Parliament to concur in their view, and they would like to reproduce a building of a permanent character which would have the same striking aspect to strangers on first arriving in this country. (Hear, hear.) Now, if we went to the south end of the city, persons who reached Sydney either by rail or road from the interior came upon a flat uninviting level of ordinary buildings. The Government thought it was a grand object, if other objects could be served, to have a great building to relieve this level and uninviting prospect that the city presented when entered from the land. They thought that a great building such as a people's library erected on this spot would be an object worthy of the city, and a great adornment of the city to all persons approaching us from the land. That of course was a mere consequence. The great object was to have a building suitable for the purposes for which it was to be erected; but if at the same time they could add an ornament to the city, they were perfectly justified in adding that adornment. It would be seen that in the third resolution he proposed, if Parliament concurred with the Government, not to confine the designs of these new buildings to the Government architect, but to invite designs from the whole of the Australasian colonies. This was not that they distrusted the ability of their own architect, but they thought that in asking the country—asking the Parliament—to sanction these large expenditures they were quite justified in trying to press into the service of designing these buildings the whole of the architectural talent in these colonies. (Hear, hear.) It would be observed that in the fourth resolution it was provided that no steps should be taken by the Executive Government until Parliament had had a full opportunity of judging what was proposed to be done, and disapproving of it if they saw cause to disapprove; and then the fifth resolution committed the Government to a speedy prosecution of these buildings. In respect to this last resolution he desired to point out that necessarily large public edifices such as they proposed would occupy a considerable time in erection, but they ought to be built upon such plans that one portion could be finished within a reasonable time, and be occupied, while the other portions could be carried out without unnecessary pressure of time, and in sufficient time to meet the general want of a larger occupation of the building. In other words, it was proposed that the plans or designs should be of such a character that the buildings might within a reasonable time be occupied; but their completion so as to be what was designed for future generations might occupy several years. It would probably be better that after sufficient of the buildings was erected for immediate purposes the remainder should be carried out with that leisure which was generally necessary to a permanent and useful creation of buildings of this kind. The Government desired at once—without any loss of time beyond what was necessary for the preparation of the proper plans—to commence the Art Gallery. He thought it was of the highest importance to the rising generation of this country that this means of high culture should be afforded, and they attached no little importance to the necessity of providing the means for the best education possible for the men and women of the country who disclosed any talent for art studies. They thought that was an object of the very highest consideration. In respect to the library, they wished to have the sanction of Parliament to at once commencing that great national institution. They believed that public opinion would go with them in both these undertakings, and they thought they had brought them forward in a manner to commend them to the representatives of the people. We all knew that in any community there was a stronger disposition for study among the humbler classes than among the highest, and innumerable examples might be quoted of the way in which persons of the poorest origin had won their way fairly to the position of useful and even eminent members of society, and the Government thought it was of the very highest importance that the library should be so situated as to be accessible to the whole of the population, and especially to that class which was the foundation of all other classes—the manual labourers of the country. (Hear, hear.) They therefore submitted these resolutions with a confident belief that the members of this House, who he was sure had only the same objects in view that the Government had, would consider them in a spirit of impartiality, and with only one view, and that the view of promoting the moral and educational interests of this country. (Cheers.) He had heard it hinted—in fact, it had been stated to himself—that these suggestions had been brought to the Government from some outside source. He could assure hon. members that the resolutions he submitted had been suggested from no source whatever. They had been framed with an honest desire to meet the wants of the country in the way most effective for the purpose aimed at. They saw no site more eligible for the Art Gallery than the beautiful site recently occupied by the Garden Palace. They said, on the other hand, that there was no site available or so eligible for the library as the one they pointed out, because it was the most central for the growing population of this metropolis. They should not let it be supposed that the country districts had no interest in this question. The country as a whole was as much interested as we were. It was very true that a great library situated in Sydney could not be accessible in the same easy manner to people at a distance as to those who resided in the county of Cumberland, nevertheless it was in various ways accessible to them. On important occasions when references would have to be made, or when information of a special character had to be obtained, it would be directly available even to people at a remote distance. Although they could not use this library in the same way as the people of Sydney and suburbs, they were interested in the education and improvement of the great mass of the people who lived in the metropolis and around it. With regard to the Art Gallery, students would find their way there, and there would be objects of study that would be as attractive and useful to the students of the country as to those of the city. He submitted these resolutions, he hoped, in a good spirit. He had no object whatever to serve than to carry out those two institutions in the way most conducive to the objects for which they were to be established. He trusted that all the sections of the House would give him credit for that singleness of purpose. It would, indeed, be a bad state at which they had arrived if a person standing in his position could not divest himself of all personal considerations. He had been actuated by but one, and that was to serve his countrymen in the creation of these great buildings in the way which would be most effective in promoting their best interests. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. STUART said he had interpolated the question whether the hon. gentleman seriously intended to go on with these resolutions on such short notice, when the matter was one of so much importance in itself. It certainly appeared to him to require a very much longer time to consider. (Cheers.) He said the matter was important in itself, because he did not for one moment deny, or attempt to traverse, the various views which the hon. member put forward of the importance of either an art gallery or a public library. But it did seem to him extraordinary that when they were called there at a somewhat late period of the year at all events—(cheers)—with an enormous mass of business pressing upon them of the greatest importance to the country, it seemed to him extraordinary that they should pause in the midst of the business in order to divert their attention to the necessity of building a public library and an art gallery, however important those matters might be in themselves. It seemed to him to be entirely out of place at the present time, and it was for that reason particularly that he took upon himself to interpellate that question. As the hon. member had chosen to bring these matters forward, it became the House to consider them without reference to the time of bringing them forward, as that was in the hon. member's own hands. He had chosen to thrust these matters upon the House at the present time, and it was only for the House to consider the resolutions upon their merits. For that purpose he proposed to address himself to the consideration of the two distinct proposals before the House. The first was a proposal to appropriate the site known as the Garden Palace site for the erection of an Art Gallery. The mover of that resolution had drawn a bright picture, with the very able hand that they knew he had at command, of the beauty of that site, and the admiration which it had caused in the minds and breasts of those who had recently paid a visit to our shores. No one could deny the beauty of the site. In its beauty it stood almost unrivalled by any other position in any other part of the world. The Art Gallery was one of those fitting things which no one would object to see occupying a site of so much beauty, but the question they had to consider at the present time went a little beyond the mere question of the beauty of the situation. With the remembrance of the fire not yet out of their thoughts, with the ruins yet unexplored, and with the causes which led to that fire still uninvestigated—(hear, hear)—it seemed to him to be hastening them on with rather too much speed. The hon. member had drawn them another vivid picture of the rapid rises of various cities or parts of cities which had been laid in ruins by devastating fires until one almost was inclined to wish that the whole city had been involved in the conflagration in order that they might have the magnificent spectacle of the greater and grander city that would arise before even a few years had passed over their heads. (Laughter.) But after all they should not allow themselves to be carried away by their mere feelings. A question of that kind should be discussed and determined upon cool, calm consideration. With regard to the Art Gallery, the question that immediately rose to his mind was whether they were in a position to erect an Art Gallery of such noble dimensions as would really make it a fitting structure to crown that site. (Hear, hear.) Had the hon. member asked them to take into consideration the desirability of erecting, say a group of grand buildings, that would have been worthy of the site, something that would by its extent have excited the admiration and the wonder of visitors as well as the citizens proper, he could have understood that there might be some pressing requirements to urge them forward; but when he remembered with what great difficulty the very small beginning of the Art Gallery had been obtained from the hon. member and from this House, and when he imagined the enormous expenditure which would be absolutely requisite in order to carry out any structure such as that which had been spoken of, then he could conceive a great deal to be gone through before resolutions of this kind would really take practical effect. It was not that he thought that the Art Gallery in its present position was in a position of safety. It was not that he did not think that it ought to be protected in some practical way. But such a structure as they were called upon to consider the advisableness of erecting would take four or five years to erect—[Sir Henry Parkes: Hear, hear.]—and it would be certainly three years before they could expect to get a picture in the place. It seemed to him to be beginning at the wrong end. They should first of all see what steps were necessary to protect the pictures that they now had, rather than begin the foundations of another Art Gallery that would take years to erect. In regard to the Free Library, the hon. member had taken great pains to inform the House that this idea of a free public library upon the site of the present Benevolent Asylum in George-street had emanated solely from the Government itself—that no extraneous aid had been called in. It seemed to him a work of supererogation to tell them that, because he did not think that the hon. member would have found a single individual in the whole city who would even have thought of such an unsuitable place for a public library. (Cheers.) Let anyone go down and look at it. No doubt the residence of the Inspector-General of Police in the midst of a great city was a remarkably nice bungalow for the person who fortunately occupied it, but was it a site that would be suitable. He considered that it was not. It was bounded by a graveyard on one side, and with continual railway and tramway traffic on the other three sides, so that it would be almost impossible for any one to have that quiet and peace in this institution which the hon. member considered to be necessary. For the study of dead literature the site certainly might be suitable. (Laughter.) Looking at the position of the railway station they would be forced to admit that some day Devonshire-street and the Benevolent Asylum would be included in the railway station. Let anyone attempt to reach the railway station hurriedly in a cab, and he would find that the present accommodation there was utterly insufficient for the railway traffic, and, in his opinion, the only way of removing the inconveniences there would be by taking in the site in Devonshire-street and the site of the asylum for railway purposes. They were asked to pass these motions, yet had never been called upon to consider that they were in direct opposition to a deliberate vote of the House. ["No, no," from the Government.] It was all very well to cry "no," but the resolution stood upon the records of the House.

Sir HENRY PARKES: I say it does not stand on the records of the House. What stands on the records is that the site intended for new law courts is a better one than that in Elizabeth-street.

Mr. STUART: The site commonly known as the Hyde Park Asylum site was intended by the Government for the new law courts, while the site occupied by St. James' school was intended for a free public library. [Sir John Robertson: No.] Certainly this was the case, and the question the House determined was that the law courts should be built on the schoolhouse site. [Sir John Robertson: No.] He would refer the hon. gentleman to the speech of the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution on the subject on March 15, 1881, and if this did not bear out what he said he would abandon the whole thing. [Sir John Robertson: Why don't you read the resolution?] No one knew better than his hon. friend that the question settled was respecting the sites for the courts and the library. [Mr. Cameron: There is nothing in the resolution about the law courts.] Was he to be trammelled by the resolution? [Mr. Cameron: Oh, certainly.] Well, he did not say that there was anything in the resolution about the courts. He was not speaking about them. The question for them to consider was whether they would approve of the sites referred to in the resolution as intended for the library. What he said in answer to this was—and he did not care about the law courts now—that the House would stultify itself in agreeing to these motions before it rescinded the resolution originally passed. (Hear, hear.) The resolution was "That in the opinion of this House the land at the top of King-street—occupied by the Immigration Barracks and the Colonial Architect's offices would be a more appropriate site for the Free Public Library than the land resumed in Elizabeth-street." (Laughter from the Government.) He failed to understand the laughter. The proposition put forward by the Government was that the St. James' school site was the best for the library, and not only was this so, but the site was resumed. It was at that time perfectly within the power of the Government to point to the grand site they were now advocating, yet they had not told the House anything about it, and why? because having ransacked the whole town for available sites, they deliberately came to the conclusion that the site in Elizabeth-street was the best. What did the House deliberately do? It accepted the motion of Mr. Reid that the Hyde Park site was a better one. [Sir John Robertson: And the asylum site is better than that.] Now he knew nothing about log-rolling in connection with this matter. [Mr. Wisdom: Mr. Reid does, though.] He really had no thought in the matter but that which he believed to be the best. He maintained that the go-by had been given to a resolution of the House. It was as much as for the Government to say, "What care we about the resolution of the House? We have not done anything to carry it out. We have ignored the vote of the House because it was carried in the face of our own intention, and now we ask the House to do something entirely different—to take this wretched miserably inferior site." It was almost an insult to the House. He would not say the House was bound to adhere to the King-street site. If a better one were found it would be their duty to consider the matter, but what he complained of was that no pains were taken to contrast the two sites with each other. They were not asked to take this site as a better one, but to approve of it as if it were the only one. With regard to the argument that the Benevolent Asylum was a great central position, he submitted that that was not the only fact to be considered. They must consider whether it was readily accessible to people who were in the habit of attending the library. He said it was not. There was nothing in the site to recommend it, in comparison with the sites which had already been alluded to. (Hear, hear.) The hon. Colonial Secretary had stated that the site of the Benevolent Asylum would not only be a central position for the city, but for Paddington and Woollahra on the one side, and Surry Hills and Redfern on the other. But what about Balmain and North Shore, especially if they were going to have these suburbs connected with the city by bridges? (Cheers.) What about Waverley and Randwick and other rapidly-growing suburbs? Was the site of the Benevolent Asylum more conveniently situated than the site of the Garden Palace? He submitted that the Colonial Secretary had entirely failed to show any advantage in fixing this site for the Public Library. Were these resolutions simply placed upon the paper as a lure to attract the attention of hon. members, in order that other more important matters might be allowed to stand still? Not one move had been made in reference to the subject under discussion until now, when the Government suddenly found it convenient to stop public business and divert the attention of hon. members from more important matters in order to consider it. He did not deny the importance of the subject, but it might have been delayed until a sum of money had been placed on the Estimates in order to test the opinion of the House. He would vote against the resolutions, but he wished it to be distinctly understood that he was in no way behind the mover of the resolution in recognising the extreme importance of this growing city having a suitable public library and academy of art. He submitted that this was an inopportune time for discussing the matter, and the site was ill-advised. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. COPELAND said he would take the Speaker's ruling whether the resolutions were properly before the House. It was very clear that these designs would necessitate an expenditure of public money. He thought that according to the following passage from "May" it was perfectly clear that the resolutions ought to have been originated in committee:—"On the same principle, of imposing checks upon solicitations for money, and moderating the liberality of Parliament, there is a standing order, 25th March, 1715,—'That this House will not receive any petition for compounding any sum of money owing to the Crown upon any branch of the revenue, without a certificate from the proper officer or officers annexed to the said petition, stating the debt, what prosecutions have been made for the recovery of such debt, and setting forth how much the petitioner and his security are able to satisfy thereof.' In addition to the necessity of a recommendation from the Crown, prior to a vote of money, the House has interposed another obstacle to hasty and inconsiderate votes, which involve any public expenditure. By standing order, 20th March, 1866,—'If any motion be made in the House for any aid, grant, or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the Consolidated Fund, or out of monies to be provided by Parliament, or for any charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof shall not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House shall think fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, before any resolution or vote of the House do pass therein.' A similar rule was made a standing order on the 29th March, 1707, viz.—'That this House will not proceed upon any petition, motion, or bill, for granting any money, or for releasing or compounding any sum of money owing to the Crown, but in a Committee of the Whole House.'"

Sir HENRY PARKES said that the resolutions were submitted simply to obtain an expression of opinion from the House. Not a single word was said about the expenditure of public money, and the works would not be proceeded until the appropriation was made.

Mr. R. B. SMITH submitted that this was a mere abstract question, and there was no necessity that it should be originated in committee. The resolutions simply asked for an expression of opinion by the House.

Mr. JACOB thought the third paragraph of the resolution was out of order, as it would, if carried, place a charge upon the public revenue.

Mr. FARNELL said that if the resolutions were passed they would involve a grant of public money, although it might be covered subsequently by a message from the Governor.

Mr. FORSTER said that the resolutions involved a vote of public money, and ought, therefore, to have been originated in committee. It was all very well for the hon. Colonial Secretary to tell them that the resolutions were only submitted in order to obtain the opinion of the House, and that the vote would be submitted afterwards. It was clear that what the hon. gentleman intended in submitting the vote was to ask the House to take all other measures that were necessary to carry out the purpose aimed at in the resolutions—namely, the invitation of tenders, and secondly, the erection of buildings.

Mr. WISDOM submitted that the resolutions did not involve an appropriation within the meaning of the standing orders. Money had already been voted by Parliament for the erection of a public library. He contended that the last resolution completely covered the whole case. Each resolution was complete in itself, and could be put separately. He contended that there was nothing in this resolution to show that anything had been appropriated by Parliament. There was no authority in this resolution to pay any particular sum.

Mr. STUART said the argument of the Attorney-General would have been very good if the point of objection taken had been that no message had been sent down to this House. If he understood him right, he had directed his attention to the matter that because this was no appropriation, therefore no message was necessary. That was not the point. (Hear, hear.) The matter was that, inasmuch as this resolution involved the consideration of public expenditure, therefore it ought to have originated in committee. (Hear, hear.) The second resolution seemed to him to be much more fatal that the others. The site of a residence for the Inspector-General of Police might be in the hands of the Government at the present time; but the site of the Benevolent Asylum was not so. It was in the hands of the trustees, and could not be resumed without payment of compensation to those trustees. And it seemed to him to be of the very essence of this resolution that if they approved of the site of the land on which the Benevolent Asylum stood as a site for the Public Library, they were virtually resolving that which would involve an amount of public expenditure, and that, therefore, the objection taken by his hon. friend was a good objection, viz., that this discussion should have originated in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPEAKER said he understood that two objections were taken to this resolution, the first being that it required a recommendation from the Crown by a message from the Governor; and secondly, that the resolutions should be submitted to a committee of the whole House. And it had been stated that the message from the Governor was required under the 54th section of the Constitution Act. He did not think a message from the Governor was required under the 54th section of the Constitution Act, because it was not a resolution for the direct appropriation of money. But this House had passed a standing order under which they were bound to follow the practice of the Imperial Parliament, because in our standing orders no reference had been made to a question of this character. And by the standing order of the House of Commons it was said—"This House will receive no petition for any sum relating to the public service, or proceed upon any motion for a grant or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the consolidated revenue fund or out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, but what was recommended from the Crown. And this rule is extended by the uniform practice of the House to any motion which, though not directly proposing a grant or charge upon the public revenue, involves the expenditure of public money." There was another standing order which in all such cases required that the House would not proceed upon any petition, motion, or bill for granting any money but in a committee of the whole House. If this resolution involved the expenditure of public money, it should be brought forward by recommendation of the Crown, and ought to be considered in committee. He did not think in all cases it required a message from the Government to give to the House a recommendation from the Crown, but that had been the practice of the House. But in the practice of Parliament the recommendation of the Crown was conveyed by a Cabinet Minister stating to the House that he was authorised by her Majesty to state that she recommended the consideration of the resolution or bill to the House. And he thought it would be in accordance with the practice of Parliament if a Minister were to state that he was authorised by the Government to recommend to the House, and the recommendation of the Crown would be properly made to the House. Then the next question that followed was, Did those resolutions involve the expenditure of public money? Upon the third resolution he could have no doubt whatever that it did. It was put as a direction to the House—"That competitive designs for both edifices be invited from all the Australasian colonies; and that the designs shall provide for an elevation by dome or tower, which shall form a conspicuous object of attraction in the approaches to the city from the sea on the one side and by land on the other." He thought it could not be contended that these competitive designs could be obtained excepting by the expenditure of public money. But it had been said that there was a vote of the House available for the erection of the Public Library. If that was the case, if the House had already passed a vote for the erection of the Free Public Library, surely it came within that vote to obtain competitive designs for it, as the expenditure had already been provided for. But he had not heard it said that a vote had been passed for the erection of an art gallery. If there was no such vote, this undoubtedly was the origination of the expenditure of public money, or a charge which involved the expenditure of public money, and he thought it required a recommendation from the Crown. Unless the House could be informed that the expenditure had been already appropriated by Parliament, he thought these resolutions were now improperly before the House. The resolutions, however, formed separate questions, and he thought the House would be quite competent to consider the first and second resolutions, throwing out the third. If the second resolution involved the expenditure of public money it could not be considered; but whether it did so or not, it was not in his power to say. But the first one did not involve the expenditure of public money, and if the House was assured that the second did not, it could be proceeded with. As a matter of ruling, any motion or bill involving the expenditure of public money must be accompanied by a recommendation from the Crown.

Sir JOHN ROBERTSON said that unquestionably there had been a large sum of money voted by Parliament for the Free Public Library.

Mr. SPEAKER said in that case that was quite in accordance with his ruling, because if the sum had already been voted by Parliament, the resolution did not involve the expenditure of what had not already been appropriated.

Sir HENRY PARKES: What you rule is that resolutions 1, 2, 4, and 5 are properly before the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in my power to say whether money has been voted by this House, or whether it is available for expenditure. These resolutions, with the exception of the third, were properly before the House.

Sir JOHN ROBERTSON rose to speak on the main question, when

Mr. W. FORSTER rose to a point of order. He submitted that it was not competent for the hon. member to withdraw one resolution. They had been submitted to the House in their integrity, and they should be considered or rejected as a whole.

Mr. SPEAKER quoted from "May" to show that when several motions were proposed, and each was the subject of a separate question, they could be put separately if the House desired it. It was upon that rule that he thought the third resolution should be omitted, and that the others might be put.

Sir JOHN ROBERTSON said that what had been said by members of the Opposition indicated that they were nowhere on the main question. They had endeavoured to prevent the representatives of the people from settling this matter. His hon. friend had committed this matter to be dealt with by the representatives of the people—

Mr. FORSTER rose to order. He would take Mr. Speaker's ruling as to whether the hon. member was entitled to speak to the whole of the resolutions, or only to those questions which had been ruled as before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. member must confine his remarks to the resolutions before the House.

Sir JOHN ROBERTSON said he was perfectly aware of that, and he did not refer to either one or the other. Those gentlemen were so particularly anxious that the merits of the question should not be settled that they tried every scheme to prevent it being settled by the representatives of the people in that Parliament. The hon. member said that the site of the Benevolent Asylum was open to the Government at the time they took the St. James's site, but the hon. member ought to know better. It would have been a perfect outrage if the Government had wrested it from that grand institution which had now lasted for some 50 or 60 years. If the Government had seized upon that site without any action or motion on the part of the trustees of that institution, it would have been a perfect outrage. Another site was considered a better one, but this one at the Benevolent Asylum was out of the question, because it had not been offered to the Government, though it had since been offered by the trustees. He was sure that two-thirds of the gentlemen who generally supported the Government would have condemned them if they had seized that institution. It was long subsequent to that that this site was offered to the Government. It was in the absence of Sir Henry Parkes, when the trustees came and expressed a wish that the Government would resume this site, possessing ample means for building in a more suitable position. It had been said by the hon. member that when the Government took the St. James's site they thought that it was the best site. It had been explained that they did not think it the best site, but there had been so much dummying—

Mr. COPELAND raised a point of order, that the hon. member was referring to the Public Library, while the first resolution related only to the Art Gallery.

Mr. SPEAKER said the whole of the resolutions were before the House except the third, which he had ruled out of order.

Mr. COPELAND said the House ought to know whether the resolutions were to be divided or not.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was competent for any hon. member to move that the resolutions be put seriatim.

Sir JOHN ROBERTSON remarked how desirous hon. members were of burking the desire of the people's representatives to settle this matter. As to the site of the Garden Palace for the Art Gallery, he understood Mr. Stuart to approve of that entirely, and he agreed with the hon. member that it was the best site for the purpose—the best site in all the world. He supposed every hon. member there would approve of it. [Mr. Forster: I do not approve of it.] The hon. member never approved of anything that he did not propose himself. (Hear, hear.) But he was talking about the site that had been selected by himself, and he was saying that Mr. Stuart was in error in saying that it was taken because it was supposed to be the best. The site further south was admitted to be the best, but there was so much dummying, and buying, and leasing that the Government determined to take the site of St. James's, and at that time the site of the Benevolent Asylum was not open to them. They took that site, and the House in its wisdom thought another site more appropriate. The hon. member had reminded him that he was not at the time in that House, and therefore could not have heard the speeches. What did he care for the speeches? the resolution of the House was all the Government had to go by. The House said the site of the Colonial Architect's Office was a better site than the other one. The hon. member did not dare to say it was the best one, or he would not have carried it. If the hon. member meant that the Government were to build a free library there he should have said so in his resolution. He merely said, however, that it was a more appropriate site. There was a "most" to come after "more." People had professed to be anxious to have a new free library, and Government after Government had done what they could to carry it out, but those very people had opposed them in every possible way. The hon. member (Mr. Reid) came into the House as a great literary light, fresh from the debating society. All his life the hon. gentleman, if he had done anything, had preached the desirability of a free library, but the very first thing he did when he came into that House was to burke the erection of a free library. It would have been built and ready for the accommodation of the public had it not been for the action of some hon. members, who were doing all they could to prevent the erection of a public free library. He remembered the time when he had the audacity to buy the present Free Library, and hon. gentlemen opposite denounced him for doing so. They always wanted a free library, but would not allow it to be erected anywhere. He doubted very much whether they were sincere in saying that they wanted a free library at all. If he sat in Opposition he would support any Government that brought in a reasonable proposal for it, and he had always voted for a free library. The resolution of Mr. Reid was a resolution without a backbone, a resolution one could squeeze into nothing, a resolution that could be made into anything. The resolution of the hon. member was too miserable, puerile, contemptible, and effete for any other member to bring forward. The site proposed for the Free Public Library was, beyond question, the very centre of the city to-day, and every year, as years rolled on, and the city grew into the great metropolis into which it would grow, the site would be more and more in the centre of the city. With respect to the hon. gentleman who voted for the motion of Mr. Reid in favour of the adoption of the site in King-street, upon which the office of the Colonial Architect stood, he would not say anything, as he did not like to throw water upon a drowned rat.

Mr. REID said that, in moving the series of resolutions, the Colonial Secretary spoke in very touching terms of the loss this country had sustained through the sudden and mysterious destruction of the Garden Palace, but amidst a sense of the greatness of that calamity they had soon perceived that that event had at least one good effect, and that was in galvanising the present Government into a sense of the urgent importance of erecting an art gallery, and a free public library. One would imagine from the way in which the Colonial Secretary and the Minister for Lands had dealt with that subject, that in the destruction of the Garden Palace all recollection had been drowned of the miserable history which had attended the attempt on the part of the people of this country to see erected a great public library. Millions of money had been expended—much recklessly and uselessly—but in the midst of that expenditure of millions for the last twenty years, where was the zeal, where was the enterprise that was to have erected that one institution designed for the very use and enjoyment of the mass of the people? Where did they find a glimmer of zeal in that long period of 20 years? It was 20 years since a sum of £25,000 was voted for the erection of that great institution whose importance had been placed before that House so vividly indeed. During that long period of 20 years, during which the Government had almost monopolised the political purse; during which they were busy in keeping their seats—in circumventing one another—and in playing the game of ins and outs, and reducing Parliament to a pitch of degradation from which no escape——

Mr. SPEAKER interrupted the hon. gentleman, and said he did not think he was justified, upon a motion of that kind, in saying what he had.

Mr. REID said he was very much obliged to the Speaker for calling his attention to the subject of the motion before the House, but he thought that he would allow him to refer to some remarks of the Secretary for Lands, which had a personal bearing to him (Mr. Reid). They did expect from a gentleman who had a reputation for generosity and manliness some exhibition of those qualities in dealing with an opponent who was a learner, and had only just entered the political arena; but that hon. gentleman had thought fit to indulge in sneers as to his (Mr. Reid's) connection with debating clubs before he entered that House. The hon. gentleman must know that some of the greatest statesmen in England owed their beginning to those debating clubs, at which he affected to sneer. Because one was compelled to devote his energies to securing an income to keep him respectable was no reason why he should be sneered at. The Secretary for Lands should be the last to sneer at such a one, who desired in his leisure to improve his faculties, so that he might take a responsible part in the legislation of this country. One thing he could say, and that was that during his experience of all these debating clubs they had never cultivated the taunts and abusive epithets which had been levelled at him by the Secretary for Lands—those clubs had never furnished such an exhibition to him as the Secretary for Lands had been guilty of on the present occasion. Now, the Secretary for Lands had spoken [illegible] been raised as an attempt [illegible] smother the proposals of the [illegible] question. Well, the [illegible] one of vital importance—[illegible] that House—it was one of the most [illegible] ing the introduction of irregular [illegible] for the expenditure of public money—it was an offence against Parliamentary rule. They scarcely expected to have heard from the head of the Government what they had heard that night, considering the number of lectures on parliamentary procedure they had received from him. And when the hon. member opposite spoke of the point of order as being an attempt to smother the proposals of the Government, he thought he (Mr. Reid) could use the words of the hon. member, and say that those resolutions were a [illegible] and deliberate attempt to smother the expressed will of that House in Parliament assembled. (Hear, hear.) That was a more distinct charge, and he thought it would be found to be a more tangible one. But before they went any further, he would like hon. members to recollect that those differing as to the question of site were taunted by the Secretary for Lands with a deliberate attempt to prevent the erection of that important institution. That was a monstrous and a contemptible charge, and reflected disgrace upon the hon. member. [Sir John Robertson: And the mover.] It was utterly untrue. And these were the very gentlemen who had monopolised the position of power, who had £25,000 voted, and who had never yet arrived at a definite conclusion. He (Mr. Reid) came into the House in November, 1880,—20 years after the hon. gentlemen were allowed a chance, and if they had only been a little more zealous, that library might have been built before he entered Parliament; but during those 20 years no serious attempt was made to erect that public edifice, designed for the intellectual improvement of the people. [Sir John Robertson: It is not true; proposals have been made, but were frequently rejected.] The Minister for Lands had got so many fanciful ideas in his head that he (Mr. Reid) could not undermine them by getting at the records of the House to find out. Well, he would knock off five years, and say that during 15 years no tender was invited for the erection of that Public Library up till the end of 1880, and the Government had had the sum of £150,000 at their hands from the month of July, 1879, under the Appropriation Act of that year to construct that building. It was only at the end of 1880, when deputations waited upon the Government and pointed out that that money would lapse at the end of the year that the Government were galvanised into activity, and tenders were called for. What was the part he (Mr. Reid) took? He was elected a member of the House in 1880—the time when there was a proposal to build in Elizabeth-street. His very first act as a member of that House was to wait upon Sir John Robertson, who was then Minister for Public Instruction, and represent to him that a great mistake would be made if the building were erected in Elizabeth-street, instead of at the top of King-street. (Hear, hear.) He did not try to steal an advantage by bringing the matter before Parliament, but he went straight to the Minister and endeavoured to persuade him; but, finding that his efforts in that direction were unsuccessful, he consulted all the members of that House representing the city and suburban constituencies. The result was that a deputation consisting of 11 members of that House, who had the approval of nearly all the other metropolitan and suburban members, waited upon Sir John Robertson and Sir Henry Parkes. That deputation made no uncertain sound; they went with a definite request that the Public Library should be erected at the top of King-street. The two hon. gentlemen upon whom the deputation called said that the utmost weight would be given to the representations of the deputation, that the matter was of great urgency, and would be attended to at once. A short time afterward he received an intimation that the Government could not change their plans. He immediately asked that House to express their opinion, and the Government actually put off all their works in connection with that Public Library until he had had an opportunity of obtaining the opinion of that House in Parliament assembled as to the proper course to be pursued. He took that view, and he moved a resolution which had been referred to by the Minister for Lands as a milk-and-water resolution—[Sir John Robertson: Hear, hear.]—and had also been referred to by the Minister for Lands as a drowned rat. Well, that resolution happened to be a resolution of that House. (Hear, hear.) It might suit the Government to be perpetually hitting at him, and kicking at him over that resolution, but the moment that that House adopted that resolution it ceased to be a resolution of one of the members for East Sydney, and became the resolution of that House. And those hon. gentlemen showed the House a very bad example by treating those resolutions with such contempt. For upwards of four years the present Administration had enjoyed an amount and continuity of the support of that House of a most generous description. There had been an obvious desire to agree to everything the Government proposed, so long as it was right. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) He was not speaking derisively, but honourably, of the House. He treated the decisions of the House, and he treated the motives of hon. members—not only those who agreed with him, but those who differed—with the utmost respect. They had had in that House a great many attacks in respect to the motives of members, and imputations had been cast at them, but one of the most deliberate and disgraceful charges against that House had been made by the Attorney-General himself that very night, upon that very question, when he accused him (Mr. Reid) of what he called log-rolling, in order to get that motion carried. Now he did not exactly know what log-rolling meant, but he believed it meant that two members agreed to vote for different things, on condition that one would support the other. But what possible interest could he have in getting the House to agree to the site for a Free Public Library? The imputation was absurd, and, more than that, it was untrue. He never asked a single member to vote for this resolution, but he spoke to a number of members, pointing out the importance of this subject, and asked them to go and see the sites and judge for themselves. He had always looked upon this matter as of the highest importance, and it was no reproach to him that he was anxious that this institution should occupy a noble site. And the House had adopted the views which he had expressed contrary to the will of the Government. But the Government had not taken a single step to show that they treated that resolution of the House with anything but contempt. It had been said that the resolution did not absolutely direct the Government to build a Free Library at the top of King-street. That was perfectly true; but it declared that the King-street site was more appropriate than the other. He had found himself in this position: the Government had resumed a site, and called for tenders, and in that state of things it was sufficient for him to move that another site was more appropriate. On the occasion when that resolution was before the House, the Colonial Secretary gave his version of it in these words: "Now, the question arises whether we should abandon this site, which is not at all suitable for the law courts, which would not be sufficiently spacious for the plans proposed for these new courts, for the higher and finer site at the top of King-street." That was the definition of the Colonial Secretary. The question before the House was whether they should abandon the site in Elizabeth-street for the site at the top of King-street, and the House decided that the site in Elizabeth-street should be abandoned, and that at the top of King-street adopted. (Hear, hear, and "No.") The Colonial Secretary said again: "The question, then, is whether the courts of law, which are part of the Government of the country, and represent the highest object of civilization, should have the superior site—seeing also that they will require more space—or whether that site should be devoted to an object of less importance, important as it may be, but which does not in the same compulsory manner affect the interests of all classes in the community." There again the question was stated to be between the law courts and a free public library. The Colonial Secretary did not think it worth his while, when moving his resolutions, to make the slightest allusion to the resolution which the House had adopted. But the hon. gentleman showed his determined opposition to the views of the House by telling them when the resolution was before them that the site at the top of King-street was intended for the law courts. But how was it, if the Government had determined to build these law courts at top of King-street, that this did not figure as No. 3 of these resolutions? The reason was obvious. The Colonial Secretary recognised very well that this House had determined that this site should be for the library, and the Government did not tackle the courts of justice because it would have brought the whole subject to too fine an issue, and the Government would have shown that they were determined to build the courts of justice in King-street and take the library elsewhere. More than that, the Government thought it necessary even to ask the formal approval of the House to their calling for competitive designs for these buildings, and actually would not, without a formal resolution of the House, take the liberty of providing that the tenders should include "a dome or tower which shall form a conspicuous object of attraction in the approaches to the city from the sea on one side and by land on the other." (Hear, hear, and laughter.) This was a new spirit that had come over the present Administration. Any number of buildings had been erected, any number of plans had been agreed to, any number of resumptions of land had been decided upon without reference to this House. If he were to describe these resolutions in the language the Colonial Secretary would use if he were in his (Mr. Reid's) position, he would call them "bunkum" resolutions, and if he described them by using a term which the Minister for Lands had often applied to the Colonial Secretary, he would call them "high falutin'." After wasting time for about twenty years, the Government now asked the House to kick them into a little more activity. The Government actually came down to this House and asked them to pass a resolution that the Government should do their duty. What did all this mean but an attempt to show the House that though they had passed his (Mr. Reid's) resolution, and thereby ventured to differ from the Government, they would punish the House and the people of future generations by putting this unfortunate library in a churchyard. (Hear, hear.) He could quite understand that the Government after all the travail and trouble they had gone through in this matter should choose the lying-in hospital as a site for one of the buildings. (Laughter.) But if the Government had been sincere with regard to the resolution which the House had passed they had one of two courses to take. They should either have carried out the resolution, or asked the House to rescind it. But they had treated it with contempt, and, after waiting for eighteen months, they now brought forward this miserable series of resolutions. He might say that he approved heartily of the proposal to build the Art Gallery on the site of the Garden Palace. They were told that this extraordinary site, which had a graveyard on one side and the railway and tramway traffic on the other, was a noble site. The hon. gentleman was jealous lest any credit should be taken by outsiders for this extraordinary discovery, and assured them that no individual outside had suggested this site. As the hon. member for Illawarra had pointed out, they could quite understand that. He did not think that it could have entered into the heads of any other set of nine men in the country to have hit upon that site. But there was another body of gentlemen whose opinions upon this subject were entitled to weight. He referred to the trustees of the Free Public Library, gentlemen of the greatest distinction, and who, headed by Professor Badham, had actually been asked by the Government to give their opinion as to the best site for the Public Library. They did so, having formed their opinion after a great deal of inquiry, and their views upon the subject were embodied in a report to which they stated :—"On the 15th August last a special meeting of the board was held to consider your letter inviting the trustees 'to offer suggestions as to the site, &c., for the proposed new building, as the question of erecting a new free public library would shortly engage the attention of the Government.' At this meeting rough plans and descriptions of several sites (including that adjoining the Australian Museum), which had been prepared by direction of the board, were considered, and the particular advantages of each site were fully discussed. The vacant piece of land adjoining the Museum was for many reasons not considered by the trustees suitable for a free library, nor convenient for the public. It was therefore unanimously agreed not to include this as one of the sites recommended to your notice, and the trustees could only find four other blocks in the city suitable in their opinion for the purpose, unless they selected land which would cost an enormous sum to purchase. They therefore chose the following sites :—1. A block of land at present occupied by the Colonial Architect's Department, including the Volunteer barracks and parade ground, and the whole of the land belonging to Hyde Park barracks. 2. A block of land in College-street, now known as Cook Park, having frontages to College-street, William-street, and Boomerang-street. 3. The entire block of city property having frontages to Elizabeth-street, Castlereagh-street, Bathurst-street, and Park-street. 4. The site of the old Colonial Secretary's Office, in Bridge-street." This, it should be borne in mind, was no political report, but was the report of gentlemen specially qualified to deal with this subject. Their report proceeded to state:—"In making this recommendation the trustees numbered the sites in the order corresponding to their opinion of the respective advantages of each block. They also took into consideration every argument that might be advanced in favour of any other sites, and they are quite satisfied that no better position can be selected for so important an institution than that which is marked as No. 1 in their recommendation, because it is within a convenient distance of the whole of the principal lines of traffic of the city and suburbs, and yet is sufficiently out of the noise and dust of the town, which is a serious consideration in the choice of a site for a public library."

Mr. CAMERON: What is the date of that report?

Mr. REID: It was dated 12th March, 1880. They said the library should be out of the vicinity of noise and dust. Could the Government have possibly found a site less free from noise and dust than the immediate vicinity of the great terminus of the rapidly growing railway and tramway traffic of the metropolis? (Cheers.) The trustees concluded their report on this subject as follows :—"The building, not being surrounded by others, would be less liable to damage by fire, and its architectural beauties would be better displayed, because it could be seen from nearly every part of the city. The trustees therefore earnestly invite your attention to the desirableness of securing this site for the new free library." The House had, it would be noticed, arrived at precisely the same conclusion in reference to the question of site as the trustees had done after special inquiry. The Colonial Secretary had stated that this building, if erected on the site that he proposed, would be nearer the centre of the future metropolis than the one in King-street. He (Mr. Reid) accepted that as the principal argument on the Colonial Secretary's side. The Colonial Secretary spoke of having seen in Melbourne many mechanics engaged in the Public Library during the day, engrossed in books. They must be men out of employment, and in that case they would not find it a matter of much consequence to walk a few hundred yards further in one direction than another. This was not a Sydney question after all. (Hear, hear.) They were voting away £200,000 of public money for this library. Nor was it a question of book-worms. They wanted to make it a great national institution, where the public could find intellectual attraction. He would not see any great objection to build this great free library near the Art Gallery. (Hear, hear.) That would be an architectural work worthy of their approval, and would not be so very far removed from the site which the House had previously approved of. He could understand a proposal to build these two great national institutions side by side; but he could not understand such a proposal as that now made by the Government. While warmly supporting the first resolution of the Government, he could not give his support to the second. If the House adhered to its former decision, it would reject the second resolution, and the effect of that would be to leave the question of the site of the library in the same state as before. As to the future development of the city, no one in that House could say what would be the centre of this great metropolis 30 years hence. The Colonial Secretary himself, at a banquet that he attended before he left for England, pictured North Shore as the future Sydney, when there would be a magnificent bridge marrying the north to the south. There could be no possible reason to support this change, for it was the Government that had changed its opinion about this site and not the trustees. They wanted a free public library that numbers of people who did not go as students would go there for pleasure, and in that way the foundation of literary tastes among the people would be laid.

Mr. CAMERON said that although he had nothing to say against the previous speaker in reference to his previous connection with debating societies, he could not help regarding the speech to which they had just listened as more the speech of a member of a debating society than of a member of a legislative body. In his peroration the hon. member had described the Public Library as a place where people were attracted for pleasure. That was a most novel description to give of an institution of this character. (Hear, hear.) He had always been of opinion that people went to an institution of that kind to read, and to read alone. (Hear, hear.) Touching the site of this building, they had the instance of the Melbourne Public Library, the most successful institution of this kind in the colonies, which was situated in the heart of the city. He gave Mr. Reid credit for a laudable desire to see this work carried into execution as quickly as possible; but, in taking steps for the erection of an institution of this kind, they ought to endeavour to serve the masses of the community. The present Free Library, for instance, did not serve the convenience of about seven-tenths of the community. It might be convenient to the civil servants, and a few property holders and residents in Macquarie-street, but it was out of the way for the great bulk of the citizens. The hon. gentleman, knowing it was desirable to exchange the site, asked them to shift it 300 or 400 yards, and so leave the great mass of the people out of it. He thought himself the library ought to be situated at least in the centre of the city, or even farther south than the locality they had heard named, and it was for this reason he would vote for the propositions of the Colonial Secretary. He maintained that 125,065 residents as against 43,173 would be benefited by the selection of the site proposed. ("What about Balmain?") Balmain was about equi-distant between the two sites, but if anything were to be said about it, it would be in favour of the site proposed by the Government. They knew a tramway was being made along Harris-street, and by that means the people of Balmain would proceed more quickly to the proposed site than to the one at the top of King-street. In fact, on the score of population, all the arguments were in favour of the proposition of the Government. He thought a great deal too much had been said about the noise of trams, and Mr. Stuart stated that the site would undoubtedly be required for railway purposes. He hoped sincerely this would not be the case. They had sufficient ground extending to the Chisholm Estate to make room for all the railway accommodation they could possibly want; and although they were going to take the railway to the side of the harbour, it seemed to him exceedingly unlikely that they were going to take it through where it was proposed the Public Library should be. What about this noise of the trams? If the library were erected at the top of King-street it would not be removed from the whistling and screaming of the motors, and he would deny that the trams made as much noise as the hon. gentleman would have them believe. Indeed, a tram did not produce as much noise as an omnibus passing over a metalled road. In Melbourne the Public Library was in the centre of the city, and although it stood off the road it fronted a very busy street indeed. [Mr. REID and other members: No.] They were not to suppose that the library here would extend to the road, and he had no fear that the people who went to it to read would be disturbed by trams passing by. He would deny that the House would stultify itself in passing these resolutions. The resolution moved by Mr. Reid was agreed to by the small majority of four. He declined to vote for it because he thought a mistake would be made, and he held now that members would not do their consciences any hurt by voting for these propositions, for, after all, it was only a matter of the choice of site that was involved. When they voted previously it was not known that the site now proposed was thought of—[Sir J. ROBERTSON: Hear, hear]—and even when Mr. Reid's motion was carried it was a matter of general complaint that the library was likely to be placed too near the northern end of the town. They knew the population of Sydney must go beyonds its present boundaries, and it could only be extended in one direction, unless it went to North Shore; and when a second Sydney was created there, he hoped they would be able to provide it with a grand free library. Mr. Stuart had said he was in favour of the Art Gallery and Free Library being erected on the site of the Garden Palace, but this would give dissatisfaction to nine-tenths of the people. What they were bound to do was to look how the great mass of the people would be affected; and in connection with this he thought hon. members would see that no better site could be selected than that proposed by the Government; that was, taking it for granted that the building must be erected at the southern end of the town. Why should all the adornment of the town be at the northern end? Surely if it were desirable that visitors coming up the harbour should be impressed with the fine appearance of their public buildings, it was also desirable that those who came overland should not be smitten with the idea that Sydney was a dreary dismal hole. They had a right to consider what should be done for that end of the city as well as the other. He believed hon. members were at one in wishing to do the best they could for the people generally, and he would remind hon. members that it was not a question which affected Sydney alone. It affected visitors from the country, and if they were to be considered, a site near the railway station was the one upon which the Public Library ought to be placed. Ever since he had given the matter consideration he had always deprecated placing the Public Library at the northern end of the city. The city was extending to the southward, and if they kept the public institutions at the northern end they would please only a minority of the people, and do an injustice to a large majority whom such institutions were intended to benefit.

Mr. GARRETT said the hon. member, Mr. Cameron, deprecated placing our public buildings at the northern end of the city, and yet he voted on one occasion in favour of placing the Public Library at the northern end of the city. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. CAMERON: I did not.

Mr. GARRETT: The hon. member voted for the site at the top of King-street.

Mr. CAMERON: No, I did not.

Mr. M'ELHONE: He did not vote at all.

Mr. GARRETT said that whether the hon. member voted or not, so far as he expressed an opinion, he was in favour of the proposal of the hon. member Mr. Reid. When Mr. Reid brought this matter before the House he (Mr. Garrett) voted against it, because he was very anxious to see something done, and they were just on the eve of doing something in the matter for the first time for many years. The hon. member who had just sat down said that the House was just as capable of forming an opinion as the trustees. He thoroughly admitted that, and the House had formed an opinion. (Hear, hear.) Whether they took the terms of the resolution of the hon. member Mr. Reid, or the way in which it was interpreted, the House had certainly formed an opinion—(hear, hear),—and he would like to know why, with comet like suddenness, this change of view was now put before them. (Hear, hear.) He could quite understand and went heartily with the Government in placing on the site of the Garden Palace a noble structure of a permanent character, devoted to the purpose designated in the resolution, but he did not know that any reason had been given, which was worth considering, why they should turn away from the course which the House determined to take with regard to the Public Library. (Cheers.) The Colonial Secretary said something about a desire to have a structure to replace the Garden Palace; and also a suitable building at the southern end of the city, which by its beauty would evoke admiration; but he would remind the hon. gentleman that we had already a noble building at the southern end of the city, in the University—(hear, hear)—surrounded by the affiliated colleges, which were scarcely less noble in their character, and the Prince Alfred Hospital. The Colonial Secretary put forward the argument that in dealing with the question of a free public library, not only the convenience of the citizens, but the whole country should be considered. If so, what difference could it make if they had the Public Library at the top of King-street, instead of on the site of the Benevolent Asylum? What would it matter if they had it at the northern end of the city, so far as the whole colony was concerned? As a matter of fact, they knew that the most enduring monuments of intellectual effort had arisen from the merest hovels and in back streets, but he said it was perfectly right, and it was a worthy policy from a national point of view, to occupy and adorn the noble positions of the city with noble buildings, for whatever purpose they might be applied. (Hear, hear.) It was absolutely ridiculous, however, to place a noble building like the Free Public Library in the vicinity of Paddy's market. (Hear, hear.) Why they would require a building as high as the Tower of Babel in order to get a view. (Hear, hear.) It was a foot lower than the railway station, and nobody could say that it was a noble position. (Hear, hear.) If hon. members would consider the surroundings for a moment, they would see the utter fallacy of taking it as a noble site for a noble building. The railway station with all its noise and bustle was alongside, and the tramways ran past it. The police station was also there, and they had the comfortable assurance that if it were necessary to remove the building they could do so by utilising the gasometer at the other side of the road. With regard to the necessity of having a free public library in a central position, he would remind hon. members that they were voting money every year for public libraries in the surrounding municipalities, and therefore as far as they were concerned it was not necessary to regard the position with any great gravity. They knew that the facilities which municipalities offered for the establishment of public libraries had been largely availed of, and therefore there could be no doubt that it was not a matter of primary importance to consider them in deciding this question. The House had determined that a noble structure should be erected, and it simply became a question whether the position which the House had already determined upon should be retained, or the position now proposed by the Government. He did not hesitate to say that the House would act wisely by adhering to the resolution that it had already arrived at, to erect the building at the top of King-street, which was an infinitely superior position to that recommended in the resolution. Of course, in a question of this kind there could not be either personal or party feeling. It was a question upon which they were all equally interested in having it settled as wisely and as speedily as possible. (Hear, hear.) There could be no higher object aimed at than to make the city beautiful as well as useful, and whether they erected upon the noble site at the top of King-street palatial courts of justice or a public library, they would equally serve the great purpose they ought to have in view, as intelligent citizens, in making the city one of the most beautiful on the face of the earth. He hoped and trusted that the House would to-night settle the question, and he thoroughly believed that, independently of all party or personal considerations, hon. members would decide that the top of King-street was infinitely superior to the miserable position chosen by the Government. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. M'ELHONE said it was quite amusing to hear the hon. member Mr. Cameron addressing the House on this question, and advocating the Benevolent Asylum as the only proper site. He thought if the Government had proposed the Blue Mountains the hon. member would have been found supporting the proposal. They had been told by the Government that the site at the top of King-street was wanted for the law courts. He ventured to say that there was plenty of room there for the Supreme Court, the Free Public Library, and the Art Gallery. He believed there were eight or nine acres there. It was nonsense to say that, because Sydney was spreading out to Parramatta, that site was going to be the centre of the city. The site at the top of King-street was admirably suited for the purpose, and in every way central. He would give his vote against the Government proposal. The resolution was simply a piece of tomfoolery on the part of the Government; it was absurd to ask the House to have the Art Gallery on the site of the Garden Palace and the Public Library at the other end of the city. The site proposed by the Government was very unsuitable. He saw nothing to justify this question being made a party question.

Sir PATRICK JENNINGS, after remarking that he saw no reason why a question like this should be made a party question, said he would confine himself as briefly as possible to the resolution before the House. Supposing the House agreed to this resolution for the selection of the Garden Palace site for the Art Gallery, the building to be erected upon it would have to be very large before it could produce anything like the effect that the Garden Palace did. And if they took into consideration the fact that the palace covered a space of five acres, he could not see how they could occupy even half of that space. They knew very well that there was one gallery in Europe, the Louvre, in Paris, which was 400 feet square—less than half what the Garden Palace occupied. He believed if there was any block of buildings erected there at all, it ought to be a public library, a museum, and a picture gallery all in one building. The Colonial Secretary had confined his illustrations to the two cities of London and Melbourne. Well, he did not think the building in Melbourne used as a public library, art gallery, and technological museum was in a more central position than either the Garden Palace or the top of King-street. And there was no analogy at all between a city like this and London. (Hear, hear.) It would be admitted that there was one great collection in the world which stood unequalled, and which comprised the greatest, the oldest, and the largest library, collection of sculptures, and paintings, all in one building—the Vatican Museum, at Rome. That was a very good authority for our placing it all under one roof. He thought in our stage of growth, if we wanted to put up a large building, it should be one with wings for each of those departments. He demurred to this being made a question of certain wards having a certain population, and certain other wards having a different population. A public library must necessarily be at a great distance from some; but it will contain works of reference that are not easily accessible, and students who require access to those works, or visitors to the country, would find either of the sites he had indicated equally convenient. It, therefore, put one in a peculiar position to have to come to any decision on this resolution. He believed if the site of the Garden Palace were made a part of the gardens, and the King-street site, with the Mint thrown in, were used for a library and national gallery, the best possible solution of the difficulty would be obtained. If this middle course were adopted a great public good might be effected. He warned hon. members against hurrying to a division; he did not quite understand why they should be called upon by the Government to hurry. He could understand the Government giving some indication to the country of their zeal to put up a building to replace the Garden Palace. He believed the solution he had indicated would satisfy the requirements of the country and the city better than the proposal on the table. If it went to a vote he should vote against putting the free library on an unsuitable site. He had been down to inspect the site at the Benevolent Asylum, and the more he looked at it the less he liked it. There was the hurry of the trains on the one side, and the noise of the trams on the other, and he could not imagine that a view of the tombs in Devonshire-street would compensate for it. He was aware that people did not go there for the sake of the trees or the view, but if they went to the sites he had indicated they would have quiet, and they would expect the Government to put up such a building as they could point to with pride and pleasure as an evidence of the intellectual advance of the people. He could not see his way towards voting for either of the propositions before them. He thought there ought to be a middle course, and they should have time to consider it.

Mr. HENSON said he should vote for the Premier's resolutions. It had been said that they were introduced at an unfortunate time, but the calamity at the Garden Palace had opened up that site, and made it available for the erection of some building; and it had been found that the Benevolent Asylum was not suitable for the purpose for which it was erected; hence there were two very important sites thrown open for selection. When the question of a library was before Parliament before there was not such a choice. In regard to the argument about the proposed site being so near Paddy's Market, they might as well say that the site in King-street was down in Woolloomooloo Bay. In regard to the noise of the railway and the tramway, he attended the board meetings at the Asylum, and they found no inconvenience; in fact, they hardly knew that there were any trams or railway at all. If they stood near that site they would see a constant stream of people there; they would see a thousand persons there for every one they saw at the top of King-street. The railway terminus and the tram being so near would be an advantage for people getting there. If looked at fairly, the proposition of the Premier would be found worthy of consideration, especially with the population that was settled there. It was really the centre of the city. He had, however, one objection to it; he rather thought it would be required for railway purposes. He did not see any reason why the idea of bringing the railway into the city in that direction should be given up, but he thought there would be room to take the railway without interfering with that site. He approved of the principle of the division of our public buildings. He thought it would not do to overcrowd the site of the Garden Palace. He felt quite sure that a great deal of justice was displayed in dividing the buildings as the Colonial Secretary had done. For instance, that site would be exposed to destruction in the case of war, and in one respect it might be regarded as a fortunate thing that the Garden Palace had been destroyed, inasmuch as it would have been a great source of danger to life and property in the event of a visit from hostile cruisers.

Mr. COPELAND said that as the views which he held were similar to those which had been expressed by Messrs. Stuart and Reid, and pretty well by Sir Patrick Jennings, and as they had probably given expression to his views in much better terms than he could, he would not detain the House for any time by giving utterance to his opinions. He was at a loss to know why the Government could not adopt one site for both buildings. He thought that all the works of art which we were likely to have for the next 20, 30, or 40 years would not be so numerous but that they could be contained in one or two rooms in the position of the dome. In the event of an imposing art gallery being erected it would be very many years before it would be anything like filled with works of art. He thought that the Art Gallery, Museum, and Public Library should be in competition together. He would move as an amendment :—"That all the words after the words 'that this House approves of the site,' be omitted, with a view to the insertion of the following words, 'at the top of King-street, at present occupied as an office by the Colonial Architect and adjoining ground, being set aside and appropriated as a National Gallery of Art and Free Public Library.'" He considered that the site of the Garden Palace ought either to be restored to the people, or to be devoted to the building of Parliament Houses. It was understood that the Garden Palace was to be only a temporary structure.

Mr. POOLE seconded the motion. He considered that as all the lines of commerce converged in the city, the city became the centre of the colony, and by the same rule the centre of the city might be found. The Benevolent Asylum site was not the most central or convenient for a large number of the residents of the suburbs. He considered that the site at the top of King-street was the preferable one, as being most convenient to the great mass of people. He was at a loss to know why the Benevolent Asylum site should be chosen, unless the directors of that institution desired to make a change, or it was intended to prevent the railway from being extended into the city. As to the accommodation of the great masses of the people, it was his firm conviction that the site at the top of King-street was quite as easy of access as the one proposed by the Government, and equally suitable in other ways. If he were to support the resolutions of the Government he should be giving his vote to taking away from the people Prince Alfred Park, for if the city were blocked in the vicinity of the railway station to any greater extent than it was now, the railways must branch off towards Prince Alfred Park.

Mr. BADGERY said he had supported Mr. Reid's resolution when it was before the House, but he did not see how in any way his voting for that resolution pledged him to the site referred to in the resolution. If a more appropriate site were found, he left himself perfectly free to vote for it, and he would vote for the resolutions on the present occasion. As a country member, he thought that when a large expenditure of public money was made, the country should receive as much benefit from it as possible, and putting a free public library where it was proposed to put it would be of benefit to the population of the country as well as to the population of the city. The city could not extend to the eastward; it must go to the south and the north, and the position of the Benevolent Asylum was very well suited to the requirements of people from the country. He doubted, however, whether it was wise to expend a very large sum of money in the present state of labour in the colony.

Mr. GARRARD agreed with Mr. Badgery with reference to the position of members who had voted for Mr. Reid's resolution. He thought the proposition put forward by the Premier was a very proper one. The danger of fire made it unwise to have on one site the buildings which were proposed to be erected; it was far safer to have them apart. The Library ought to be built where it was likely to do the greatest amount of good, and the site proposed by the Government was much better than any of the other sites that had been named.

Mr. PIGOTT said he would vote against the proposals of the Government. He regarded them as a challenge to those members who were in favour of the extension of the railway into the city, and those who had supported Mr. Reid's former resolution. The site proposed by the Government for a gallery of arts, he thought, was too valuable for such a purpose, and should be used for a new Government House when the site occupied by the present one was utilised for the station for the railway which must be made to Circular Quay. He thought the Gallery of Arts and Library should be under one roof, and the site he proposed for it was Cook Park, which in every respect was suitable for it. If the Library were placed on the site contemplated by the Government, he feared the persons frequenting it would be greatly disturbed by the trams. Certainly quietude could not be ensured for them. The occupation of the site, too, he held, would block the extension of the railway to the city. There were numerous precedents in European cities for having the Art Gallery and Free Public Library under one roof, and it was only right that it should be so. He would vote against the resolution.

Mr. KIDD said that if the erection of the Public Library on the site proposed would interfere with the extension of the railway to the city, he would vote against it; but he did not think it would. Exception had been taken to the surroundings; but hon. members must know that when the Public Library was erected those surroundings would disappear; and it was absurd to mention Paddy's Market, which was a quarter of a mile away from the Benevolent Asylum. The site proposed by the Government would undoubtedly be a convenience for the great mass of the people, as it was close to the railway terminus and was approached by the tramways. It was true that libraries existed in municipalities, but they were of only a limited character and ought not to be taken into consideration in deciding this question. He would support the resolutions, and considered the site well chosen.

Mr. DOUGLAS supported the resolutions as far as the Art Gallery was concerned, but hoped the Colonial Secretary would reconsider his proposal about the Public Library, because he thought that the two institutions should be together. He, however, while supporting the first portion of the resolution, emphatically entered his protest against the erection of an Art Gallery at the present time, while so many more important public works were at a standstill for want of sufficient labour. He also thought the site proposed for the Public Library was ill-advised.

On the motion of Mr. HENRY DANGAR the debate was adjourned until Wednesday next.

The House adjourned at 13 minutes past 11 o'clock until 4 o'clock on Friday.

PROTECTION AND WHEAT-GROWING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

Sir,—Whenever the question of protection and free trade crops up here, we always have the old stock arguments of the protectionists in comparisons drawn between New South Wales and Victoria and unfavourable to us. We are always told that Victoria produces so much more wheat than New South Wales, and that this fact is accounted for by the protective duty on wheat in Victoria.

I wish to point out that there are other causes at work to produce this result. First, as anyone knows who has travelled in the two colonies, there is an enormously larger area of land in Victoria naturally fitted for the plough than we have in New South Wales. Here, except in a few limited spots, a heavy initial expenditure has to be made before the ground can be ploughed. The expense of clearing land amounts to from £2 10s. to £7 per acre, according to the density of the timber growing on it. In Victoria there are millions of acres naturally cleared of timber or very lightly timbered, and fitted at once for the plough. Secondly, the land laws of Victoria compel her free selectors, as a condition of acquiring the freehold, to cultivate one-tenth of their holdings within a certain period; and having done so, they sell out to the large landed proprietors, protection notwithstanding. These two causes will largely account for the more extensive cultivation in Victoria.

I am, &c., W. H. SUTTOR.

METROPOLITAN DISTRICT COURT.—THURSDAY.

(Before Mr. District Court Judge JOSEPHSON.)

TATE V. BURNS.

Plaintiff sued defendant for £123, which he claimed for work and labour done and agreed to be done in repairing the Gladstone Park Hotel at Leichhardt. Plaintiff alleged that he performed part of the work, and had been willing and ready to complete the whole according to agreement, but was not permitted by defendant to proceed. The defence was that the work had not been well done, nor completed to the satisfaction of the architect. His Honor suggested a settlement between the parties; and ultimately it was agreed that a verdict should be entered for £100, each party to pay his own costs. Mr. Coghlen, instructed by Mr. A. Rofe, appeared for plaintiff; and Mr. G. J. Sly for defendant.

FITZGERALD V. NOBLE.

Plaintiff sought to recover the sum of £12 16s. 4d. for work and labour done, and materials supplied. A verdict was given for the plaintiff for £11 4s. 6d., and costs of four witnesses.

BRADRIDGE V. JOHNSON.

In this case the plaintiff sued defendant for the balance of an amount due on 32 weeks' rent of premises at Wolli Creek, Cook's River, at £1 18s. 5½d. per week. The amount claimed was £49. A verdict was given for the plaintiff for £30, and £10 costs, upon terms as arranged between the parties.

WILSON V. BELL.

Plaintiff, who was executor of the will of John Sadling, deceased, sued defendant to recover the amount of certain promissory notes made by defendant in 1881, in favour of John Sadling, and afterwards dishonoured. The amount claimed was £11 17s. 9d. Defendant pleaded that credit had not been given for payments at different times, which reduced the amount due on promissory notes to £5 5s. 3d. A verdict was given for plaintiff for £10 6s., and cost of one witness.

METROPOLITAN QUARTER SESSIONS.

THURSDAY.

(Before Mr. District Court Judge DOWLING.)

The Court re-opened at 10 o'clock. Mr. G. H. Fitzhardinge and Mr. F. L. S. Smyth prosecuted for the Crown.

JURORS FINED.

SENTENCES.

Ah Fong, convicted of assault with intent to commit an unnatural offence, was sentenced to two years' hard labour in Maitland gaol. Patrick M'Donell, who pleaded guilty to uttering a forged order, was sentenced to five years on the roads. Daniel M'Donall, who pleaded guilty to a similar offence, was sentenced to four years' imprisonment in Maitland gaol.

UNLAWFULLY WOUNDING.

In the case of Morgan Kelly, charged with unlawfully wounding Ewan Cameron, the jury, after being locked up all night, still stated their inability to agree. They were thereupon discharged, and the defendant was bound over to appear at the next Sydney Quarter Sessions, or at any such other time and place as the Attorney-General may appoint.

EMBEZZLEMENT.

Arthur James Fawcett was charged with having, on the 20th April last, embezzled a valuable security, to wit, a bank draft of the value of £80 2s. 4d., and £21 6s. 10d. in money, the property of the Mutual Insurance Society of Victoria; also with having, on the 1st May last, embezzled a valuable security, to wit, a bank draft of the value of £174 11s. 2d., and £122 1s. 8d. in money, the property of the same society. Mr. G. N. Reid, instructed by Mr. J. M. Curtis, appeared for the defence. Mr. Colquhoun instructed the Crown Prosecutor in the case. For the Crown it was endeavoured to be proved that the Mutual Insurance Society was registered in Victoria, and Mr. Chambers, a Victorian solicitor, was put in the box to prove that he filed the articles of association in the office of the Registrar-General, Melbourne. He also referred to the Victorian law on the matter, quoting a section by which it was enacted that the notification in the Victorian Gazette of the registration of the company was conclusive evidence that the company was duly registered. In further proof of the registration of the company, the Crown produced a certificate by an officer in the Registrar-General's Department in Victoria, but in no way attested or sealed.

Mr. Reid objected to the evidence as to registration, on the ground that the certificate, not being sealed or attested, was no evidence whatever.

The Crown Prosecutor here said that he would not press the certificate.

Mr. Reid contended that the Victorian Gazette produced did not prove itself in this colony—that there was no Act making such Gazette proof in itself in this colony, and that there was no proof that it was a Victorian Gazette at all. He further objected that, even supposing the company were properly registered in Victoria, they were not legally carrying on business here, inasmuch as it was a limited company, and should have been registered under our Companies' Act as such. We were in no way bound by the Victorian laws.

His HONOR said, under all the circumstances, he would refrain from giving an expression of opinion on the law of this matter. The charge against the defendant was embezzlement, and one of the most important points in the case was that he did so by virtue of his position as servant to some corporation. But a limited liability corporation was unknown to common law. Corporations were shifting bodies. There were two points in the case, the first was that the law, even of Victoria, had not been complied with. Well, he was not to be bound by the law of Victoria. But he would assume that the company had been legally and properly incorporated in Victoria; even then he could not take judicial notice of their Acts. How could this company be here in this colony the masters of the prisoner? He thought the second point in the case was a good one, and therefore he must tell the jury that it was a good one. It was said that a great many cases would hang upon the decision in this case; but the next case could be taken to a higher court. He thought the case broke down, because the Crown had failed to prove that the company were the prisoner's masters.

His Honor then directed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, which they did, and the prisoner was discharged.

LARCENY.

In the case of Walter Frere and James Henry Mitchell, indicted for stealing the sum of £150 from Andrew E. Forsland, by means of the matchbox trick, the prisoner Frere did not answer to his bail. The Crown Prosecutor applied to have his recognizances estreated, and this was done. The case against Mitchell was postponed till next sessions, the prisoner being allowed bail, himself in £200, and two sureties in £100 each.

KEEPING A HOUSE OF ILL-FAME.

Frederick Willis and Lizzie Willis alias Emma Graham, were charged with keeping a disorderly house, at 216, Crown-street. Graham pleaded guilty. Mr. R. H. Levien appeared for the male prisoner. After evidence had been heard, the jury found the prisoner guilty. Willis was sentenced to six months' hard labour, and the female prisoner to three months' imprisonment in Darlinghurst gaol.

STEALING FROM THE PERSON.

Thomas Bourke was charged with that he did, at Sydney, on the 31st August last, feloniously steal from the person of one Elizabeth Culbert one purse and 13s. 11d., the property of Nicholas Culbert. Mr. G. Merriman defended the prisoner. On the night of the day stated, at about a quarter-past 10 o'clock, according to the evidence for the Crown, the prosecutrix was passing through Phillip Park, on her way to her home in Gipps-street when she was accosted by the prisoner, who made improper proposals to her. She rejected them, and the prisoner thereupon assaulted her and took her purse out of her pocket. She screamed, and Constable Stuart coming up at the time secured the prisoner, and found the money lying on the ground where he had thrown it. The evidence was not altogether clear, and the jury without leaving the box returned a verdict of not guilty.

The Court adjourned at 10 minutes past 5 until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

The following is the list of cases for trial to-morrow (Friday):—Jane Cuddiford, larceny; Charles Sweeney, unlawfully wounding; John Russell, false pretences; Michael Taylor, inflicting grievous bodily harm.

THE MOLONGLO CREEK COPPER LAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

Sir,—In his motion for adjournment on Friday night, Mr. Ryrie brought my name very prominently and undesirably before the House, and as I could not reply to his charges there, I trust you will allow me to say a few words in your columns to vindicate myself from the charges brought against me.

The statement that I was one of the syndicate who were about to purchase the Molonglo copper land is totally untrue. I was employed professionally to report on the cupriferous character of the land, and also on the title of the vendors who had applied for a mineral lease of it.

Finding that Mr. Chaffey had minerally conditionally purchased the land, and knowing from the opinions of the Attorney-General, and Messrs. Darley, Salomons, Pilcher, and Want that a mere application to lease was useless against such a purchase, I advised my clients accordingly; but having discovered that Mr. Chaffey's description was to a certain extent vague and incorrect—which, however, might be amended under the 14th clause of the Lands Amendment Act of 1875, if it lay only between him and the Crown—Messrs. Laing and Mills and I minerally conditionally purchased the land under correct descriptions, and thus contested the validity of Mr. Chaffey's claim to it.

Under the imperfections of the land and mining laws which the Crown law officers had advised upon nearly two years ago, the applicants to lease, who are morally the rightful owners of this land, lost all claim to it when Mr. Chaffey made his mineral conditional purchase, and we, therefore, did not interfere with the men's claim in any way.

We had no desire to take the land from them, or to injure them; and in an interview which Mr. Mills and I had with them and Mr. Ryrie on Saturday last, we offered to sign a document (before Sir John Robertson if necessary) giving up all claim to the land providing Mr. Ryrie could secure a decision in the men's favour, which would prevent any one else coming in over our heads and taking it again from them under M. C. P. This offer they rejected, and said they would have the land in spite of us. I replied, "Very well, we will fight for it."

Feeling that the men might have acted hastily and without due consideration, I met them again on Tuesday morning, and in the presence of Mr. Fletcher, M.L.A., Mr. Mills, and Mr. Kirby, told them I thought they were very foolish in having treated my offer as they had done, and again repeated it to them; when they replied in a most offensive manner. "Thank you for what you have no right to give; we will have it in spite of you." I then said, "This is the last offer I shall make you, and as you refuse it we shall fight our claim to the end."

Having thus done all I could to meet Mr. Ryrie and his partners in a fair spirit, I regret that he should have considered it necessary to waste the time of the House in a personal attack upon me, where he knew that I had no opportunity of replying to his charges. I am, &c.,

W. BEDE CHRISTIE, L.S.

BOROUGH COUNCIL.

RANDWICK.—Meeting held on 19th September. Present—the Mayor, and Aldermen See, Wall, Yeoman, Denning, Wilson, and Napper. Minutes of last meeting read and confirmed. The council received the representative of the Electric Light Company, who answered several questions and communicated information concerning the utility of the electric light. Correspondence read: To J. C. Royle, returning his letter censuring the Mayor for permitting the subdividing of land in the borough into small allotments. To Mrs. Kiss, conveying to her the sympathy of the council in her bereavement. To the Minister for Mines, requesting that four reserves at Coogee be vested in the council; also that 25 acres adjoining the racecourse be reserved for a public park, and that permission be granted to construct baths below high water mark at Coogee Bay. From Mrs. Kiss, thanking the council for their letter of condolence. From Mr. Yeoman, applying for kerbing in Botany-street, near his property, on usual conditions. Granted. From the Department of Roads, stating that sums of £30 and £21 16s 4d had been paid to the council's credit for repairs to the minor road from Sydney to Coogee and Randwick to Waverley. Accounts were passed amounting to £105 18s 2d. A report was read from the works committee, recommending that portions of Beach and Brook streets be repaired where most required, and that the reforming of Power-street take precedence of Bream-street; also drawing attention to the condition of Frenchman's-road, Beach-street North, and particularly to Power-street. The report was adopted. Moved by Alderman See, seconded by Alderman Wall,—"That the trust road, from the foot of St. Jude's Hill to the racecourse, be repaired at a cost of £48." Carried. On the motion of Alderman Yeoman it was determined to expend the sum of £151 in reforming Gordon-street. A motion in Alderman Wilson's name, proposing to urge the Government to vest all reserves, except those under control of trustees, in the council, lapsed, the Mayor having explained that this had already been done. Alderman See, by permission of council, moved without notice,—"That the Government be requested to resume the five acres at Coogee, owned by J. Godfrey and others, for the purpose of a recreation reserve." The motion was carried, and Messrs. Tricket, Hezlett, Clarke, and See, Ms.L.A., the Mayor, and Alderman Bradley were appointed to interview the Colonial Secretary on the subject. Alderman Wall was appointed to a seat on the works committee, vacated by Mr. Kidman. The Mayor and Aldermen See and Wall were appointed as a committee to arrange the establishment of a library.—W. B[illegible], Council Clerk.

The "Nilometer," or instrument used in measuring the annual rise of the Nile, is situated on the Island of Roda, opposite Old Cairo. It consists of a square well or chamber, in the centre of which is a graduated pillar divided into 17 cubits. The state of the river is proclaimed daily in the streets of Cairo during the inundation by several criers, to each of whom a particular district is assigned. The usual maxim of the rise is from 24 to 26 feet.

In metals the market continues very dull; a parcel of Davies's Crown galvanised iron was placed at £23 10s. Pig iron, owing to the weight of shipments and the strike, is dull of sale, and the price low. Jute goods are without alteration in value. In building materials, cement continues to sell at the cheap rates lately ruling. The lumber sale at Messrs Harris and Ackman's this afternoon was numerously attended, and almost the whole of the unsold portion of the Escort's shipment from Burrard's Inlet was cleared at prices, on the whole, fully equal to those obtained for the cargo previously sold in the open market. The following were the figures:—3 x 10, 11s. 6d; 3 x 11 and 4 x 9, 11s.; 4 x 10, 12s. 3d. to 13s.; 4 x 14 and 4 x 16, 12s. 9d.; 6 x 6, 13s. 3d.; 6 x 9, 13s.; 6 x 10, 13s. 3d.; 6 x 12, 14s.; 6 x 14, 13s. 9d.; 6 x 18, 14s. 9d.; 7 x 7, 13s.; 7 x 10, 13s. 3d.; 7 x 12, 14s.; 7 x 14, 13s. 3d.; 7 x 16, 13s. 9d.; 8 x 12, 13s. 6d.; 8 x 16, 14s.; 9 x 10, 13s.; 9 x 12, 13s. 3d.; 10 x 10, 14s. 6d.; 14 x 14, 14s. 9d.; 16 x 16, 15s. 3d.; 18 x 18, 16s. Messrs. Hill, Clark, and Co. report that at their wool sale to-day prices ruled very firm, and some of the new clip offered realised highly satisfactory prices, considering the quality and condition. Greasy brought from 7d. to 10d.; scoured, from 12d. to 16d. for medium quality only. Sheepskins were firm, at from 2d. to 3d. for pelts, 3½d. to 4½d. for short, 5d. to 6d. for medium growth, 6½d. to 7½d. for full-woolled and fine.

Mr. R. B. Wallace, in his monthly report, dated Newcastle, October 4, says that general dulness has prevailed in the freight market, and requirements have been met by the arrival of limited disengaged tonnage. Freights remain almost nominal. With the exception of Hongkong, Yokohama, and Java, there is no enquiry for foreign business. For the intercolonial trade medium-sized vessels could be placed at quotations. The associated colliery proprietors having notified their intention to advance the price of best coal from 1st January next to 11s. per ton, that may be taken as the current price for 1883.

The Sydney Morning Herald.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1882.

In the Legislative Assembly yesterday,

Ministers replied to questions respecting the proposed insurance of Government buildings, the fares charged on the King-street, Woollahra, and Waverley trams, the proposed Civil Service Bill, the new Court-house at Uralla, the conferring of knighthood on the Agent-General, the road from Warren to Coonamble, the Government town allotments at Nyngan, the petition from the guards on the Western line, the hours of engine-drivers and firemen, the application of the locomotive men for an appearance book, the holding of a meeting in the interests of the Irish Land League at the School of Arts, Bathurst, and the remuneration of the railway officials on the Western line for Sunday work.

Messages were received from his Excellency the Governor intimating that the Royal assent had been given to the Defendants' Evidence in Summary Jurisdictions Bill, and the Barristers' Admission Act Amendment Bill.

Leave was given to Mr. Teece to introduce the Tarlo Estate Bill, and the bill was brought up and read a first time.

Sir Henry Parkes moved resolutions declaring:—(1). That the House approved of the site lately occupied by the Garden Palace being set apart and appropriated as the site of a National Gallery of Art. (2). That this House approved of a suitable portion of the land now occupied by the Benevolent Asylum and the residence of the Inspector-General of Police in Pitt-street South being set apart and appropriated as the site of a free public library. 3. That competitive designs for both edifices be invited from all the Australasian colonies, and that the designs shall provide for an elevation by dome or tower, which shall form a conspicuous object of attraction in the approaches to the city from the sea on the one side and by land on the other. 4. That the designs adopted by the Government, with an estimate of cost, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament for the term of one calendar month before any contract is entered into for the erection of the said edifices. 5. That, subject to the foregoing conditions and the appropriation of money for the purpose, the erection of both edifices shall be commenced and carried out to completion with the least possible delay." After referring to the devastations caused by great fires at Southwark, Chicago, and other places, and the movements of the local inhabitants for the erection of new buildings in the room of those which had been destroyed, he said the inhabitants of this colony should, as a British people, show that they were able to take care of themselves under similar circumstances, and that they were not to be intimidated by such a calamity as the destruction of the Garden Palace. Hence, it was desirable that this matter should be brought forward at once. He drew a wide distinction between an art gallery and a public library, and believed the proposed site of the art gallery was the most beautiful in the world, and he was sure the erection of the building on the crown of the ground where the Garden Palace stood would be in harmony with the objects and surroundings of the gallery. Great libraries should be in centres of population; and the Government had selected the site of the old Benevolent Asylum for the Sydney Public Library, for obvious reasons. The site was one of the noblest in the city, and was in the very heart of the growing population of the metropolis. The selection of the site in question showed a regard for the wants of succeeding generations, and in particular of the classes who would be most concerned in the Library. The Library should, in his opinion, be a structure of architectural beauty and an object of adornment to the city. It was no disrespect to the Colonial Architect that competitive designs were to be invited in all the colonies. He believed public opinion would go with the Government in this matter; and he hoped the House would consider the resolutions with the one object of promoting the moral and educational interests of the colony.

Mr. Stuart thought it seemed extraordinary that the Government should at the present time interrupt the mass of business before the House by pressing forward these resolutions. There was no doubt as to the beauty of the site where the Garden Palace had been erected, but the matter which the House had to consider went far beyond that. The Government appeared to be hastening onward at too great speed, while the ruins of the Garden Palace still remained, and they had yet to discover the origin of the fire by which it had been destroyed. He saw some difficulty in getting a building of sufficiently noble proportions for the site, when he recollected the difficulties which had hitherto been experienced in obtaining assistance for the Art Gallery from the Colonial Secretary. A more unsuitable site for the Public Library than the Benevolent Asylum could not be chosen, as it was bounded on one side by a graveyard, and on two others by trams and rails; and must in time be wanted for the enlargement of the railway accommodation. They had not been asked to consider that the present proposal was in opposition to a vote of the House, which was agreed to in March, 1881, on the motion of Mr. Reid. There would be some reason in grouping the Art Gallery, the Public Library, and the like buildings on the site of the Garden Palace. The Colonial Secretary had failed to show why the Benevolent Asylum site should be chosen for the Public Library, and the Government had hitherto ignored the resolution of the House to which he had previously referred. He intended to vote against the resolutions if they should be put as a whole, and certainly against the second resolution if they should be put seriatim.

After a discussion on a point of order raised by Mr. Copeland, it was ruled by Mr. Speaker that the third resolution could not be put.

Sir John Robertson charged the Opposition with desiring to burke the resolutions of the Government, and preventing their being considered by the representatives of the people. The leader of the Opposition nevertheless appeared to concur with them in the opinion that the Art Gallery should be erected on the site of the Garden Palace. The Government were not before in a position to select the Benevolent Asylum site for the Public Library, as it would have been a perfect outrage if they had done so till its trustees had asked for another site. The resolutions of the House only declared that the site near the Colonial Architect's offices was better than the site in Elizabeth-street—and when they were passed, it was not known that the asylum site could be obtained.

Mr. Reid condemned the speech of Sir John Robertson, and defended his own course on the question of providing a site for the Public Library. He also censured the Government for treating resolutions of the House with contempt, and for expending public money without the sanction of Parliament, as in the matter of the purchase of a country residence for his Excellency the Governor. He was in favour of the first, and against the second resolution, and he ridiculed the selection of the Benevolent Asylum site for the Public Library.

Mr. Cameron contended that the Public Library should be in the centre of the city, and he quoted statistics in support of his view that the Benevolent Asylum was well situated for Sydney and suburbs. The House would not stultify itself by voting for the resolution of the Government.

Mr. Garrett could not see why the House should depart from the resolution which it had already approved of, and was opposed to the Benevolent Asylum site being selected.

Mr. M'Elhone disapproved of the conduct of the Government respecting the site for the Public Library, and was convinced there was room for the Public Library, Art Gallery, and Law offices on the Government land at the top of King-street.

Sir P. Jennings thought the whole question could be solved by both the Art Gallery and the Public Library being erected on the site of the late Garden Palace.

Mr. Henson supported the resolutions.

Mr. Copeland moved as an amendment that both buildings should be erected at the top of King-street.

The original resolutions were further supported by Mr. Badgery, Mr. Garrard, Mr. Kidd, and Mr. Douglas, and were opposed by Mr. Poole and Mr. Pigott.

Mr. Douglas thought the Library, as well as the Art Gallery might be erected on the site of the Garden Palace, and that the condition of the labour market was such that the Government should first proceed with works of necessity.

On the motion of Mr. H. C. Dangar, the debate was adjourned till Wednesday next.

The House adjourned at 16 minutes past 11 p.m. to 4 p.m. this day (Friday).

Although in these colonies railways are Government monopolies, the element of competition is not on that account wholly excluded; and since this colony and Victoria met upon the border, the competition of the two Governments has been very marked, and has been a constant subject of criticism. It is not, however, the first time that our colonial railway tariffs have been influenced in this way, for on a small scale the same phenomenon has been exhibited before. In Victoria the Government took passengers from Melbourne to Geelong at a cheaper mileage rate than on any other line, for the simple reason that it had to compete with the steamers; and in the same way, in our own colony, the fares to Parramatta were from the first graded with a view to competition with the river steamers. Still more, we have even seen an instance in which a portion of the public tried to force a competitive reduction on the Government. Some years ago it may be remembered that the Goulburn people, when complaining of the rates, got up a carriers' opposition by the common road, with a view to undersell the Government, and so force a lowering of the railway rates. Just at present, however, the noteworthy form of competition is that between the two great colonies, and it has led to the result that not only is carriage for long distances proportionally less than for short distances, but there appears a positive bounty on living at a distance. Victoria carries wool for the Deniliquin squatter more cheaply than for one at Echuca, and New South Wales has gone very near to imitating the same policy. The consequence is that in both colonies there have arisen complaints on the part of those who think they are overcharged, and who argue that if carriage at long distances pays at low rates it ought to pay equally well at the same rates for intermediate customers. It is interesting to note that the point thus raised is by no means peculiar to these colonies, or to countries in which railways are in the hands of the Government. The very same matter has been under discussion in England, where the people in many of the Midland counties have raised a cry against the undue preference given to the through traffic. The farmers complain that American corn and meat is carried from Liverpool to London at lower rates than English corn and meat is carried to the same market. Fruit and hops are carried from Boulogne or Flushing to London at a lower rate than from the Kentish fields. Belgian iron wire is taken to Birmingham at a less rate than Birmingham wire is carried to London. Burton beer goes to Ireland more cheaply than Dublin porter goes to London. A host of similar incongruities are pointed out, and a cry has arisen that the railway companies ought to be compelled to treat all customers alike, by having a uniform mileage rate subject only to such variations as may be fairly chargeable on the extra cost of making or working difficult sections of railway. Mr. T. H. Farrer discusses the subject in the Fortnightly Review, and points out that the anomalies nearly all arise from the pressure of competition—that the railway companies have to work against a cheap sea traffic, and that it is better for them to get the through business at a low rate than to lose it altogether—that a uniform mileage rate would diminish their gross business, and therefore their net profits, and that their gain consists also with the general gain of the community, by cheapening the carriage of commodities to the markets where they are most in demand. He argues further that the complainants are benefited absolutely by the railways, though they think themselves injured relatively. They are better off than they would be without them, and when railways are once constructed, the natural course of trade leads inevitably to the custom that is complained of.

The question has been not only examined into by Parliamentary committees in England, but it has also been raised in France. Special tariffs have been instinctively adopted there by all the railway companies. In a recent report prepared by Mr. Waddington these are indeed, condemned; but according to Mr. FARRER, French love of clearness and equality have much to do with this recommendation; while the argument that exports ought to be carried more cheaply than imports distinctly shows that protection has inspired a good deal of the proposed policy.

The German Government has already to some extent patronised the policy of equalisation, and has done it from a protectionist point of view, but the effect, according to Mr. FARRER, has been to divert and diminish traffic. Coal still goes from Westphalia to Hamburg, but the return waggons, instead of carrying English iron, become expensive empties. A through trade from Russia and Austria to German ports is turned away to Russian and Austrian ports. In one instance, where the people of Mannheim had the alternative of the water-carriage of the Rhine, the Government had to go back upon its policy in order to recover the trade from the river. It is a curious illustration of the difference in policy which may result from a difference in circumstances, that while in France and Germany Government influence is in favour of equal rates, in these colonies, where the Governments have the matter all in their own hands, they favour unequal rates; but our Government Railway Departments fight for bainess just as commercial companies do, partly for the sake of the colony for which they labour, and partly to get a good dividend on the national investments. The peculiarity, however, in the case of our railway departments is that there is in their policy a mixture of the national and commercial principle. Our railways are not private speculations, and those who conduct them have no personal interest in the amount of dividend, and yet to a large extent they find themselves compelled to profess, and act upon, ordinary commercial principles as the groundwork of their tariff. Railway companies that do not profess to be anything more than commercial adventures look solely to profit, and are held to be justified in doing so as much as a steamship company or a coaching firm. A Government which has no direct interest in railways, but which regulates them only in the general interests of the community, disregards financial considerations entirely. Our Government combines both functions. It is a Government and a railway company rolled into one. It is forced to have the instincts of both, and to do the duties of both. It has to make the railways pay, and to make the railways serve the country. It has to look after dividends, and to guard itself against the abuses to which a too exclusive regard for dividends might give rise. It has to allow itself all the privileges which have been conceded by Governments to railway companies, and to impose on itself all the restrictions under which companies have been laid by the wisdom of Parliament.

Last evening's discussion on the proposal of the Government to put up a new Art Gallery on the site of the Garden Palace, and a Public Library on that of the Benevolent Asylum, if not remarkably profound, was certainly an animated one. Seldom indeed has the House allowed itself to be so excited over matters pertaining to literature and art. It need hardly be said that it was neither the question of the Art Gallery nor that of the Public Library that worked honorable members into so much intensity, but those who for years past have been contending for some such line of action as the PREMIER proposed will not quarrel about that. It is no doubt to be regretted that a cataclysm of some sort is necessary to move the authorities to anything like enterprise. It was the building of the Exhibition that led the Government to take upon itself the responsibility of having an Art Gallery at all, and it is the burning down of that structure that has awakened the conviction that the Art Gallery of a metropolis like this ought to be larger and more substantial than the one we have in the Domain. But to do a thing for the reason that it can no longer be put off is better than not to do it at all. The criticisms which the PREMIER'S proposals evoked, while on some points extreme, were not altogether uncalled for, although it could not be said that the resolution passed by the Assembly eighteen months ago committed the Government to build the Public Library at the top of King-street. The fact that the House did pass such a resolution might well have been recognised. Further, the PREMIER has consistently opposed any encroachment upon the open spaces of the city, and the reason given for the proposed encroachment was not a particularly forcible one. It must not be forgotten that the Garden Palace was built within the Governor's reserve, not because it was deemed desirable to occupy such a site for such a purpose, but because a suitable site could not be found elsewhere. Nor will it be overlooked that the Exhibition building was never intended to be a permanent one. The present Botanical Gardens are already too small for their purpose, and any such erection as the one contemplated would be in the way of their extension in about the only direction in which they could be extended. Moreover, if, as has been intimated, the plan for a large Art Gallery is to be a part of a design for a Centennial Exhibition building, it is worth inquiring whether there is anything like room enough in the Domain for the carrying out of so comprehensive a scheme. We are not prepared to say that the site of the Garden Palace is a wrong one for an Art Gallery, or that that of the Benevolent Asylum is wholly unsuitable for a Public Library. But there will be a very general opinion to the effect that the whole subject is worthy of larger inquiry than the Government seems to have given to it. It certainly is not enough to say, as the PREMIER did last night, that the one thing wanted in the site for an Art Gallery is picturesqueness, and that the one thing wanted in the site for a Public Library is accessibleness; and that while a Public Library exists for purposes of study, an Art Gallery exists for those of recreation. Both institutions are for purposes of study, and both are for purposes of recreation. And while it is very important that the site of an Art Gallery should be picturesque, it is equally important that it should be easy of access. There can be no doubt that the site of the Benevolent Asylum is an excellent one, and that in many respects it would prove suitable for a Public Library. But it should be remembered that a Public Library ought to make provision for lecture rooms as well as for reading rooms, and that while the locality of the railway station may become a general centre hereafter, it is out of the line of much of the traffic of the metropolis now. The question of the proper site of both the institutions named ought to be closely looked into, and by men who have special qualifications for dealing with these matters. It is most satisfactory to be assured that the Government are at last alive to the importance of the task referred to. But in commencing so serious an undertaking as the one marked out, while it is necessary to be in haste no good may come from our being in a hurry.

The Parliament of Queensland has passed a resolution in favour of reciprocity treaties with the other colonies. Permission to make such treaties was given by a special Act of the Imperial Parliament, but has not as yet been turned to much account. The reason is that it has not hitherto appeared to be to the interest of any of the colonies to limit their freedom and tie themselves up by engagements of this kind. Tariff changes have been very common in all the colonies, because there have been great fluctuations of fortune, and Treasurers have been glad to help themselves out of difficulties by falling back on the Custom-house. No colony has yet felt the temptation sufficiently strong to give up this advantage, and bind itself down by treaty obligations.

The movement in Queensland appears to have originated in a desire to have cheaper wines than can be imported from Europe. The local vignerons have objected in a protectionist spirit to the free admission of the wines of the more southern colonies. But they have been answered by the statement that Queensland cannot produce good wine. The three other colonies on the mainland can; and though they are hindered by Customs barriers from interchanging wines with their neighbours, they at least have their own for consumption. New Zealand, Tasmania, and Queensland cannot produce wine profitably, and have to pay the same duty on colonial as on foreign wine.

It may be said that if Queensland desires cheaper colonial wine there is no necessity whatever to have a treaty. All that is necessary is to reduce the duty on its wine, and the thing is done. But Queensland has a second object in view, and that is not only to buy wine but to sell sugar, and out of its desire for cheap wine it would lay a basis for a bargain to make a market for its sugar. In other words, it will hold up its custom as a wine-buyer as a bait to the other three colonies to get them to take its sugar. But these colonies either mean to keep up their sugar duties or to abandon them. If they want to keep them up, then they have to ask themselves whether it would pay them to lose the sugar revenue simply to get the Queensland custom for their wines. The larger market would benefit their winegrowers, and might gradually stimulate wine production, although the Queensland business divided amongst the three colonies would not be very appreciable to either. But the arrangement would not compensate the Treasury for the loss of the sugar duties. If, however, the southern colonies think of abandoning their sugar duties, and there has been a talk of this in each of them, then it is obvious that such a surrender cannot be made the basis of a bargain, and Queensland will be rather precipitate in giving up its wine duties for the sake of a concession which may in a few years come of itself. Looking therefore at the extreme uncertainty of the tariff in each of the colonies, it seems somewhat premature at present to discuss reciprocity treaties, even if such treaties were not open to strong objection on other grounds.

One of the new members in the Legislative Council made, on Wednesday night, in explanation of his position in the Upper House, a statement that is of more than ordinary interest to the public, as it indicates another of the various phases of political life with which from time to time we become acquainted. Not long ago, the member who in the Legislative Assembly represents Bourke made, at a meeting of his constituents, some remarks which were strongly condemned both in the press and in Parliament, because they disclosed a state of affairs that was calculated to strike a blow at the purity of politics in this colony; and on Wednesday Mr. BRODRIBB thought it well to intimate to the members of the Upper House, in an equally novel way, that his action in that House was likely to be very different from his action in the Legislative Assembly, when he was a member of that Chamber, because his position now was very much changed from what it was then. "He had been a member of the Legislative Assembly," he is reported to have said, "to which he was returned without opposition by a large constituency, and he had there felt himself bound to conform to the wishes of his constituents. In this House, however, he was in a different position, for he represented no constituency and was under no obligation." When Mr. BRODRIBB made this statement, he was addressing the House upon the Employers Liability Bill, which, he said, was a one-sided measure, difficult to comprehend, and, in one sense, class legislation of a very objectionable kind. Are we to understand that if the hon. gentleman had been discussing the bill in the Legislative Assembly, and his constituents had desired him to speak and vote in its favour, he would, instead of condemning it, have given it his support? That is what his explanation of his position implies. It implies even more. It leads to the conclusion that while he was in the Assembly he exercised no independent action or thought, but was a mere delegate at the beck and call of those who sent him there. It casts a doubt upon all his utterances and all his votes. They may have been honest and conscientious enough; but by the hon. member's statement on Wednesday we are asked to believe that he neither spoke nor voted except in conformity to the wishes of his constituents. Surely the hon. gentleman did not intend that his position as a member of the Legislature should be so understood. The duty of a member of Parliament has a wider range than that which is bounded by his own electorate. He enters Parliament, not only as member for a certain constituency, but as a representative of the general public; and it is as incumbent upon him to guard the interests of the latter as it is to attend to the wishes of the former. Any sacrifice of his independence is fatal to the high trust which he should consider is placed in him when he is elected, and full of danger to the wellbeing of the country.

It is satisfactory to learn that steps have been taken with the view of checking the very common practice of child desertion in this colony. Drunken and dissolute parents, finding their children an inconvenience, simply desert them, and the cost of their maintenance and training is forthwith imposed upon the State. Our public institutions have such a liberal and accommodating Government to depend upon that they accept the responsibility of bringing up these waifs and strays with comparatively little demur, and the vicious parents escape entirely unpunished in a very great majority of these cases of desertion. In a young and prosperous community like this, where sober and industrious people can always find profitable employment, and where the hardships of a rigorous climate are entirely unknown, there can rarely be any excuse for child desertion, and the police should therefore be specially instructed to trace and punish offenders of this class. The Criminal Law Amendment Bill, which is now being considered by Parliament, and which is in a fair way of becoming law this session, affords an excellent opportunity for dealing with this matter. The Board of Directors of the Randwick Asylum have resolved to take advantage of that opportunity, and Sir ALFRED STEPHEN will be asked to deal with the question in some practical manner when the bill comes before the Upper House. It was stated at the Board meeting on Wednesday that there were no less than 300 deserted children in the Randwick Asylum alone. It is evident that there is a serious defect in either the present law or its administration, otherwise the parents of such a large body of children would not be able to so easily shift their burdens on to the State.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

SOME of the British troops in Egypt have already embarked at Alexandria for England, and the embarkation of other portions of the force will be continued without interruption. In fact, the whole of the British troops, with the exception of the brigades under Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir Archibald Alison, are to leave during the present month. Turkey appears to be somewhat concerned at the fact that Great Britain is to leave an army of occupation in Egypt for some time. The Sultan has asked the British Ambassador at Constantinople to name the date upon which the last of the British troops will be withdrawn, and failing to get a satisfactory answer, has intimated that he will appeal to the Great Powers. The Commission of Inquiry has commenced its labours, which are of a preliminary character. Those officers against whom there is a prima facie evidence of their revolutionary conduct will be sent on to the courts-martial for trial. It is said that the British are in possession of documents which prove that the massacres at Tantah and other places were committed under the direct instigation of Arabi.

HER MAJESTY is again about to seek change of air and scene by a visit to the south of Europe. It is announced that she will shortly visit Cannes, a seaport town of the south of France, on the Mediterranean.

FIVE months have elapsed since the commission of the outrage in Dublin Park, and still the murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke are undiscovered. It is reported in one of our cablegrams this morning that the daggers used by the assassins have been found; and the police believe that ten of the persons concerned in the outrage are in Ireland yet. It is somewhat curious that the police should be so precise as to numbers, and yet know of nothing that would lead to the identification of one or more of the ten. They may, however, have a clue which they can successfully follow up. It is to be hoped they have. We learn also by this morning's messages that two more agrarian murders have been committed. Both victims were farmers, most probably earning an honest living for themselves and their families; but then the land they were tilling was land from which non-paying tenants were some time ago evicted. In connection with these crimes several arrests have been made.

THE difficulty between France and Madagascar in regard to the order recently promulgated by the Queen of the island, prohibiting the sale of land to foreigners, is forming the subject of a diplomatic mission. An embassy from Madagascar has arrived in France, its object being to lay before the French authorities a statement of certain agrarian disputes between French residents in Madagascar and the Government of the island.

NEW SOUTH WALES vignerons have not sent their wines to the Bordeaux Exhibition for nothing. The jurors have awarded, one of our cable messages states, not fewer that eight gold and 15 silver medals. The jurors' recommendations are, however, subject to revision. The Australian wines appear to have found much favour amongst buyers, and large orders have, it is said, been given.

BY miscellaneous items of news by cablegram, we learn that Prince Bismarck, after a short respite from labour, has improved in health, and will shortly return to Berlin to resume his official duties. A congress of associated Chambers of Commerce has opened at Gloucester. The Matanra's New Zealand mutton realised from 4¼d. to 5¼d. per lb.; whilst the shipment by the Garonne, from Australia, is fetching 5¾d. per lb.

THE P. and O. Co.'s steamer Verona, with mails from London of 25th August, arrived at Melbourne yesterday, at 8.30 a.m. Our portion of the mails reached Albury last night, and the Postmaster-General having arranged for a special train to leave there about midnight and reach Sydney between 1 and 2 o'clock p.m. to-day, the letters will be ready for delivery from the General Post Office during the afternoon.

IN the Legislative Assembly yesterday, Sir Henry Parkes brought forward his motion for the erection of a National Art Gallery, on the site of the late Garden Palace, and a Free Public Library on the site now occupied by the Benevolent Asylum. The debate was animated, and kept up till nearly 20 minutes past 11 o'clock. An amendment was moved by Mr. Copeland in favour of having the site at the top of King-street utilised as a public library and an art gallery in one building. The debate was adjourned till Wednesday next.

A NEW kind of fire extinguisher was tested at Fort Macquarie yesterday afternoon, in the presence of a number of commercial gentlemen and the heads of several Government Departments. The extinguisher is called Foster's Chemical Fire Engine, and is manufactured by the Chemical Fire Engine Company of Bolton, Lancashire, for whom Messrs. Scott, Henderson and Co. are the local agents. The principles of these machines is that they each contain a chamber charged with chemicals, and a chamber capable of holding, say 50 gallons of water. Both having been filled, the machine may be kept for almost any length of time ready for action. When occasion arises for its use a handle should be turned, when the water becomes impregnated with carbonic acid gas, and, by means of a small lever pump, a jet of this water may be directed on to the fire. It is said that the 50 gallons of water is thus made equal to 1250 gallons of water and gas, and that the gas is very effective in smothering the flames. The machines are of different sizes, but the largest are about a couple of feet in height and three feet in length, and placed on wheels. The test yesterday afternoon was not of a satisfactory character. A small shed with some rubbish in it was thoroughly set fire to, and under the direction of Superintendent Bown, of the Insurance Fire Brigade, the jets from three of these patent engines were brought to bear upon it. The fire was under control in 15 seconds. The fire was then allowed to burn up again, and three jets of plain water—that is, not impregnated with gas—were directed against it, and the fire was under control in 40 seconds. Mr. Bown pointed out that the test was not a fair one, and suggested that a fairer test would be to simultaneously start two fires of equal strength, and play upon one with plain water and another with chemicalised water, and compare the results. It was promised that a test of this kind would be made on some subsequent occasion.

WE understand that the Bishops of the province of New South Wales, after much deliberation, have chosen the names of the Right Rev. Dr. Parry, Suffragan Bishop of Dover, and the Rev. Richard Appleton, M.A., to submit to the Bishops of Australia and Tasmania, from whom to choose a bishop for the See of Sydney. The Rev. Dr. Fleming, Canon of Westminster, is thus shut out of the competition.

A MEETING of the finance committee of the City Council was held yesterday afternoon, when the reports of the architects requested to give a critical opinion on the merits of the design submitted by the city architect for the alteration and addition to the City Hall were laid on the table. A discussion followed, in which it was maintained that the hall in the design was not of sufficiently large proportions. Alterations were suggested, and the matter was postponed for a week. Before the meeting closed Alderman Carter gave notice of his intention to move at the next council meeting that the motion authorising the city solicitor to defend the Mayor in Alderman John Davies' action against him be rescinded. The Mayor said the motion having been passed could not be rescinded.

HIS HONOR the Primary Judge, Sir William Manning, was engaged all yesterday in further conference with the committee appointed to revise the new Equity rules. The task of the committee has been most onerous, as may be judged by the fact that for five days they have been consulting his Honor and the work still remains unfinished. With the Chamber business and this committee his Honor has been kept as busily occupied as if the Court were still in full work. Sir William will go on circuit in a few days.

THE Metropolitan Quarter Sessions were continued yesterday before his Honor Mr. District Court Judge Dowling. Mr. M. H. Fitzhardinge and Mr. F. L. S. Smyth prosecuted for the Crown. The following prisoners were sentenced:—Ah Fong, assault with intent to commit an unnatural offence, two years' hard labour; Patrick M'Donall, uttering a forgery, five years on the roads; Daniel M'Donall, four years' imprisonment in Maitland gaol. The jury were unable to agree in the case against Morgan Kelly, and they were discharged, the prisoner being bound over to appear when called upon. The charge of embezzlement against Arthur James Fawcett broke down, owing to a technical objection raised by Mr. Reid, the defendant's counsel. Walter Frere, charged with larceny, did not answer to his bail when called upon, and his recognisances were estreated; and a similar charge against James Henry Mitchell was postponed till next sessions. Frederick Willis and Emma Gresham were sentenced, the former to six months' hard labour, and the latter to three months' imprisonment, for keeping a disorderly house. Thomas Bourke was found not guilty of stealing from the person. The Court then adjourned until to-day.

AN important legal point arose in a case of embezzlement at the Metropolitan Court of Quarter Sessions yesterday. A defendant was charged with embezzling moneys belonging to the Mutual Insurance Society, which is registered in Victoria. Mr. Reid, who appeared for the defendant, objected to the evidence as to the registration of the society, on the ground that the laws of Victoria were not binding here, and contended that the society should have been registered here before they could prosecute at common law. The point was upheld by his Honor Judge Dowling, and the case against the defendant, therefore, broke down.

THE second events for the Francis Punch trophy came off yesterday afternoon, when in the first division Trickett and Beach finished 1 and 2 respectively; Rush and Laycock finishing 1 and 2 in the second division. The final heat which appears to be creating some speculation will be rowed on Saturday at 4.30 p.m., when the four men named are to compete. An exciting race is anticipated.

AT 11.30 a.m. yesterday the last girder of the Iron Cove bridge was placed in position on the cylinders, and three weeks hence the planking will be finished and the structure ready for traffic. The work, which has been carried out for the Government by Mr. R. Rothwell, engineer, with Mr. J. Evans as overseer, is a credit to all concerned, and, considering the ponderous weight of the material used in the construction of the bridge, they are to be congratulated on the fact that its history has not been marred by a single accident. The length of each of the principal girders is 126 feet 3 inches, depth 11 feet, and the weight 35 tons. No notice of the work having reached this eventful stage was given, and consequently there was no ceremonial; but the men, of whom there are 28 employed, gave hearty cheers for the Government and Messrs. Rothwell and Evans.

THE delegates appointed to attend the Free Selectors' Conference in Sydney met at the Town Hall yesterday. Mr. John Gale, the chairman, submitted what he said had been agreed upon as the free selectors "platform," which, he also explained, was composed of five "planks." The delegates affirmed that it was desirable to abolish auction sales of Crown lands and sales to lessees in virtue of improvements. They next proposed to deal with the question of abolishing interest on conditional purchase balances, but as the time for adjournment had arrived, and the question was considered of great importance, discussion upon it was reserved until this morning. Particulars of the "platform" and the meeting will be found in another column.

THE Health Society of New South Wales held their annual meeting last Monday, Sir William Manning in the chair. The report showed a lamentable falling off in the amount of contributions, but a hopeful spirit for the future was manifested notwithstanding: the chairman remarking that the Model Lodging House was the growth of this society, and a determination was expressed to carry on the useful work. Sir Willing Manning was re-elected president; Mr. A. T. Holroyd vice-president; Mr. C. Lester hon. treasurer; and Mr. B. Bradley hon. secretary.

ON Tuesday the monthly meeting of the Animals' Protection Society was held at Spring-street, the chairman, Mr. E. Fosbery presided. Members present:—Messrs. J. Stewart, J. Tait, A. W. Gilles, W. Bradley, W. W. Stephen, W. J. Weston, W. Beaumont, A. Forsyth, the secretary (J. Sidney), and inspector (J. Webber). After the usual finance business, letters were read from the principals of the following Public and private schools:—Petersham, Paddington, Coogee, Mettens Creek, Cudal, Penrith, Coonabarabran, Mrs. Hare (William-street), and J. Collins (Cleveland-street), acknowledging the awards sent to the successful competitors for the society's prize for the best written essays upon the use of animals to man, and man's duty towards them. The inspector's report is summarised as follows:—Prosecutions, 6; convictions, 5; one case dismissed; cases under investigation, 8; complaints, 7; cautions, 11.

THE teachers and children of the Public school, Woollahra, have presented Mr. S. Y. Burnett with a marble clock and mantel ornaments as a memento of his connection with the school. Mr. Burnett has been head master of the school since it was opened some years ago. Acting upon medical advice, he has severed his connection with the teaching profession and adopted another vocation.

MR. MORRIS GREENWALL, who left by the Zealandia yesterday, has been the recipient of a beautifully-illuminated address conveying the good wishes and bearing the signatures of many friends made in Sydney. It will be remembered that Mr. Greenwall introduced Miss Dargan to the colony, and managed for her during her long and successful tour. Accompanying the address was a purse of 200 sovereigns.

MR. T. CADELL, of Narellan, has imported by the s.s. Essex some valuable brown Leghorn fowls and a Plymouth rock pigeon.

AT about 20 minutes past 12 o'clock yesterday morning a fire broke out in a hayloft above a set of stables, the property of Messrs. J. and A. Wadsworth, and situated in Hay-street. In the stables beneath the hayloft were four horses, which, however, were removed before any harm was done to them. A number of vehicles were sheltered in an adjoining building, and they, too, were removed before they were damaged. The police and neighbours worked well and kept the fire under till the Insurance and Volunteer Fire Brigades arrived, when it was extinguished. The fire plug in this instance was found to be in a similar state to the one at the late fatal fire, choked with bluestone, and it was some time before it could be used. The damage done by the fire was not very extensive. The building was insured in the Australian Mutual Insurance Company.

A MAN named Dunn was last night arrested in connection with the late fire at Mr. Wright's bedding warehouse, George-street. Incendiarism was suspected at the time, and this arrest has been the result of the investigations of the detectives.

THE body of Captain Thos. Bulman was yesterday found by the Water Police near his ship, the Colwyn, under such circumstances as lead to a belief that he committed suicide. On the evening previous he was seen between the hours of 9 and 10 o'clock walking in his cabin. About an hour after that time the watchman heard a splash in the water near the stern of the vessel, but on going to the side saw nothing to account for it. In the morning, the captain not being seen about, suspicion was aroused. His cabin was searched, but he was not there. The matter was reported to the water police, who took down a drag, and at about 12 o'clock brought the body of the deceased to the surface of the water. It was found that the deep-sea lead-line was fastened from the stern round his chest, under his arms, in such a manner that the lead at its termination depended from over his chest. The weight of the lead was 28lb., and kept the body under the water. The line must have taken some considerable time to arrange. The matter has been reported to the City Coroner.

THE following is an extract from the Government Analyst's testings of the Australian Gaslight Company's gas, for the month of September:—Illuminating Power: Mean for the month, 17·94 candles; maximum, 19·18; minimum, 16·80. Impurities: Sulphur, mean for the month, 7·0 grains per 100 cubic feet; ammonia, 1·11 grains.

THE Scotsman reports that a very destructive fire occurred at Austermere, the residence of the Hon. John Lackey, at 3 o'clock on Saturday morning last, which resulted in fully £300 worth of property being destroyed. It appears a fire was lit in some rubbish on the previous day in close proximity to an outhouse, adjoining which was the dairy, buggy-house, &c., containing a buggy, two drays, spring-cart, harness, and other valuable property, and during the night some sparks must have blown from the fire and ignited the building, and spread with such rapidity that it was soon burnt to a cinder. Three men who were sleeping in the building had just time to escape before the roof fell in. Mr. Lackey's own dwellinghouse narrowly escaped being destroyed, as one portion of it caught fire, but was with some difficulty extinguished. Early on the morning of the 24th September Mrs. Villier, of Mervla, near Moss Vale, had her five-roomed slab house (shingle roof) and all its contents burnt to the ground, which will, no doubt, be a serious loss. How the fire occurred is not known, there being no one on the premises when the fire broke out. The total loss is estimated at between £200 and £300.

AT a meeting of the Melbourne Chamber of Commerce, held on October 2 (reported in the Argus), a letter was read from Mr. W. Westgarth, accompanied by reports of the three days' proceedings at the conference held in Liverpool in August, under the auspices of the "Association for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations," at which Mr. Westgarth attended as delegate from the Melbourne chamber. Amongst the subjects which the conference had discussed was the law of affreightment, and, incidentally, the diversity of forms of bills of lading now in use, which had led to great inconvenience and embarrassment in the commerce of the world. After lengthy debates the conference had unanimously agreed to a form of bill of lading, which was to be recommended for general adoption, and which it was hoped would lead to uniformity of practice in the ports of Europe and America. The new form was examined by the committee, but without fuller consideration it was thought inadvisable to express an opinion upon the alterations proposed, and the matter was therefore referred to a sub-committee for consideration and report.

SWEEPSTAKES (says the Argus) have been prohibited—on paper—and no sweepstakes can be openly managed, but the business is carried on, under a thin disguise, in a wholesale fashion. As the law stands, therefore, it is eminently mischievous, for it allows the sweepstakes to take place, and yet it prevents that publicity which would be a check upon fraud. Prosecutions have been tried, and have failed, and the members of the ring have realised and are taking advantage of their immunity. At first the business was very much in the hands of one man, who, it is said, was trusted with £50,000 by the public last year a fact which illustrates in a lively manner the extent of the transactions. This man was well known, and his honesty was believed in; but a host of dubious characters are now following in his track. A fortune is offered for a shilling, for half-a-crown, for five shillings, for ten shillings, and for a pound. The lottery business is in full play, and is conducted in the worst possible manner by the worst possible hands. There is a consensus of testimony that the lottery business should not be associated with the daily life of a community, as its tendency is to deprave the young and the weak. As a rule, the public lottery is suppressed; but here the system is in full operation without there being the smallest guarantee of fair play. The promoter has the public at his mercy. He may publish a purely fictitious prize list for the edification of his patrons, or he may allot the favourite horses to himself and the outsiders to his subscribers. He may do anything he pleases to put money in his pocket at the expense of those who have trusted him. An extraordinary amount of credulity is required to believe that one and all of the sweepstakes promoters of the period are of immaculate honesty, and as a matter of fact it is declared by people who should know that we may safely come to the very opposite conclusion.

PARLIAMENT OF VICTORIA

[BY TELEGRAPH.]
(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MELBOURNE, THURSDAY.

In the Legislative Assembly to-day, in reply to Mr. Carter, the Treasurer stated that the contract with the Associated Banks requires the Government to pay interest and principal of the loan through the agency of the association, otherwise they would have to pay contract commission. Mr. Carter notified his intention to move that this House disapproves of the provision that interest and principal shall be paid through one particular agency for a period of 25 years. The Postmaster-General in reply to the question stated that it was impossible to name a day for the consideration of that portion of the Governor's speech relating to the reduction of postage. Mr. Carter requested the Speaker to use his influence for the purpose of improving the ventilation of the chamber, and urged that a much cooler atmosphere might be secured if the electric light were substituted for gas. The Premier cordially endorsed the opinion that it was necessary something should be done, and agreed that the question should be referred to the Parliamentary Buildings Committee. The whole of the remainder of the sitting was devoted to a discussion of the report of the select committee appointed to report on the suitability of stone for the facade of the Parliament Houses. Progress was reported. The report of the Standing Orders Committee, recommending that the practice of giving private bills precedence over all other private business on private members' days be continued, was adopted after discussion. The Speaker ruled that the movement for the severance of territory on the south bank of the Yarra, and annexation to the City of Melbourne, can only be carried on by a private bill.

The line is to be constructed in three sections, Nairne to Callington, 10 miles; Callington to Murray Bridge, 15 miles; and the Bridge to the Victorian border, via Border Town. The second reading was fixed for Thursday. The first section will cost £163,000, the second £122,000, and the third £642,000.

The letter further intimated that it was intended to form a Chamber of Manufacturers in Sydney, and suggested that the chamber should regulate the rate of wages. A resolution was carried that this chamber would be happy to co-operate generally with the Sydney chamber when inaugurated, but did not consider it advisable to attempt to regulate wages.

Many will regret that it is brought to a close, but all will admit that the proposed benefit to Harold Armytage (Mr. George Rignold) is well deserved. THE WEATHER.

The reports furnished of the weather yesterday, at 9 a.m., indicated that rain had set in over various parts of the colony, with some prospect of lasting. But these prospects are, in some degree, dissipated by returns published by the telegraphic authorities, at 3 p.m., when rain was reported at the following stations only:—Young, Orange, Carcoar, Yass, Raymond Terrace, and Singleton. It was showery at Wellington, Gulgong, and Bombala, whilst at many stations whereat rain had prevailed up to 9 a.m., it was reported as dull and cloudy, such as Forbes, Coonabarabran, Hill End, Bathurst, Kiandra, Tumut, Eden, Bega, Cooma, Queanbeyan, Moruya, Araluen, Braidwood, Goulburn, Wollongong, Windsor, Barrenjoey, Newcastle, Manning Heads, Taree, Maitland, Murrurundi, Menindie, Wilcannia, Bourke, Brewarrina, Waigett, Piliga, Wee Waa, Narrabri, Boggabri, Gunnedah, Tamworth, Armidale, Bundarra, Warialda, Inverell, Glen Innes, Clarence Heads, Grafton, Ballina, and Casino. It was fine at the following stations:—Tenterfield, West Kempsey, Kiama, Gundagai, and Mount Victoria; so that indications of rain prevailed over a wide scope of the colony; and there is no cause for serious anxiety at Sydney, where there were slight indications yesterday morning, and at Parramatta the rain set in last evening, so that it should not take many hours in reaching Sydney.

TRAM TO BONDI.

A public meeting was held last night at the Council Chambers, Waverley, convened by Mr. John Macpherson, J.P., the Mayor of the borough, in compliance with a requisition, "to consider the necessity of urging the survey of the tram line to Bondi." The Mayor presided, and in opening the business said that the object of the meeting was one in which he had considerable interest, and in regard to which he had on several occasions had interviews with the hon. the Minister for Works, and was at once surprised and disappointed at the delay which had taken place in respect thereof, in spite of repeated promises that the work should be at once proceeded with. Mr. Lackey had said that the Government were quite alive to the fact that the line to Bondi is of quite as much importance, and as much needed, as that to Coogee, and that no time should be lost in effecting the work. A few nights ago, the Minister, in reply to a question by their member, Mr. W. Trickett, said that the Government had not decided upon making the line to Bondi—a want of decision which he did not at all understand, seeing that their population was much larger, and ever would be much larger, than that of Coogee. The requisitionists said nothing about the duplication of the line to Waverley, but he believed that if the people of Waverley would bestir themselves they would soon obtain the duplication of the line, at least as far as the Tea Gardens, as already the Waverley line was far in advance, as a paying concern, of any line the Government had opened. Every stranger visiting Sydney paid a visit to Bondi, and how it was that Randwick had succeeded in obtaining what Waverley and Bondi had failed to secure he could not tell. Perhaps they had a stronger Parliamentary power; but their members, Messrs. Trickett and Hezlet, had done all that they could in the matter—one of whom, Mr. Trickett, was present, and the other had sent an apology for his absence, and stating that he had been informed by the Hon. Mr. Lackey, the Minister for Works, that no other than a trial survey had yet been made, that no line had been adopted, that every opportunity would be afforded the inhabitants of Bondi to object to any line before tenders were called for, and that their wishes would as far as possible be consulted.

Alderman Fletcher moved the first resolution,—"That in the opinion of this meeting the tram line to Bondi Beach will not, if constructed, be of any advantage to the larger number of the residents of Bondi; and that the Government be urged to construct a line that, while it shall terminate at Bondi, shall also pass through the populous portion of the district." He said that the delay which had arisen was, no doubt, partly attributable to the divided wishes amongst themselves as to the most suitable line. But the line which had been pointed out was altogether the reverse. They had a school and a park, to neither of which would it lead, but landed them in a ghastly swamp.

Mr. A. K. Mackenzie seconded the motion. It was sheer madness to attempt a line which, instead of going to the population, would skirt the borough either on one side or the other.

Mr. Greaves supported the resolution. It was never supposed, he said, but that the tramway would follow in the lines of the omnibuses which they had driven off, but which had attracted the population to the borough. He hoped that the Government would adopt such a line as would suit the requirements of the population, instead of a line which would be at least half a mile from the habitations of the people.

Alderman Henderson also spoke in support of the motion. They did not want a line either on Mr. Mackenzie's land on one side, nor on Mr. O'Brien's on the other boundary of the borough, but one which would afford facilities to the residents by running through the inhabited portion.

The motion was put and unanimously carried.

It was moved by Mr. Henning, seconded by Mr. Dickson, and carried,—"That the following gentlemen be requested to form a deputation to the Hon. the Minister for Works, and lay before him the resolution just adopted by this meeting: Aldermen Henderson and Fletcher, Mr. Greaves, Mr. A. K. Mackenzie, and J. Bodell, M.L.A."

Alderman Wiley moved,—"That the deputation be instructed to ask the Minister for Works to permit the contractor for the tramway line to prosecute the work at so much per mile from Queen-street to the Waverley terminus."

Mr. Mackenzie seconded the motion. Mr. Thompson spoke in support of it, and, on being put from the chair, it was unanimously adopted.

Mr. W. Trickett, M.L.A., was called upon, and briefly addressed the meeting. While he thought that the delay in making the tram to Bondi was unjustifiable, he was not sure that the fault did not lie with themselves. He was sure that Mr. Lackey was anxious to do that which would be productive of the greatest benefit; but they had not agreed among themselves which route would be the most convenient. He could not tell why the tramway to Coogee had been promoted and that to Bondi left out in the cold; but he was sure that still further delay would result unless they exhibited a little more union amongst themselves as to the route which would be the most advantageous.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman concluded the business.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

THE CAULFIELD MEETING.

[By Telegraph.]
(From our Special Reporter.)

MELBOURNE, Thursday.

The Spring campaign will be fairly commenced at Caulfield on Saturday, when there is every promise of large fields and excellent racing. Proceedings will begin with the Selling Plate, for which Kanaka looks about the most trustworthy, unless the Ghost runs up to his private form. The Hurdle Race is very open, and even now it is hard to pick a certain starter out. At the weights, Red Rover, Discount, and Merry Maid may divide the honours. The South Australian filly, Biz Bis, appears to be about the best of the rather moderate lot engaged in the Great Foal Stakes, and she may have most trouble with Amelia, Victoria, and Precious Stone. The Caulfield Guineas bids fair to be a great race between Guesswork, Fryingpan, Transferred, and Hecla, and if the firstnamed, who is rather a bad-tempered fellow, be in a racing humour, he must take a deal of beating. He has been going particularly well since his arrival from Adelaide, and he looks hearty, muscular, and well. Fryingpan is one mass of muscle, and has evidently undergone a thorough preparation, and, if he runs up to his private trials, will be very hard to beat. Hecla appears to be even better than she was at Randwick; and the friends of Transferred are very confident. I do not know whether Boolka has arrived yet, but he is said to be very well, and may give trouble. The race promises to be very fast, and Guesswork, Fryingpan, Hecla, and Transferred may come home as named. Erin may win the Challenge Cup, and the places for the Toorak Handicap may go to Larpent, Dongalston, and Stockdale.

Latest Betting.—Caulfield Guineas: 9 to 2 Guesswork. Maribyrnong Plate: 10 to 1 Nerina. Other prices as previously quoted.

Sweet William, Navigator, and Gudarz have arrived; and Paul, Lohengrin, the Chrysolite filly, the Guna filly, the Rose d'Amour colt, the Lady colt, and the Gascade colt are expected to-morrow. Mr. Wentworth's horses and Creswick are expected on Friday.

THE PUNCH TROPHY.

The second day's events in connection with the Francis Punch trophy yesterday resulted, as was expected, in the defeat of Macdonald and Pearce in the heats in which they rowed. The racing needs brief description, because from the outset it was evident that Macdonald had no chance against either Laycock or Rush, whilst the same may be said of Pearce as against either Trickett or Beach. The arrangements on this occasion were well carried out, the same rule of punctuality being observed as on Tuesday. Anticipating, however, an accession in the members of the press on Saturday, for whose convenience a small space is allotted in front of the boat which conveys the people of the Fourth Estate, it may not be untimely to suggest that the barrier which excludes the general public should be placed much further astern. Steamboat proprietors, too, should not ignore the request of the starter by running ahead of the starting point, and thereby creating a heavy swell over the waters, to the embarrassment of those who compete. This conduct on the part of those who were in charge of steamboats, and who forged ahead scratch, was very reprehensible, after being beckoned to the contrary by Mr. Grattan. After a little delay the trio in the first division were got off in capital order, and for some time the men kept tolerably well together, Pearce, from whom better things were expected, being first to fall to the rear. He appears to have contracted a habit, conspicuous amongst all young oarsmen, of too closely watching the progress of those against whom he is rowing, instead of giving all his attention to the work in hand. He led off for the first three quarters of a mile, to the delight of his friends, with apparent advantage over Beach, but at that stage he evinced the habit to which we refer, of looking repeatedly to the right, after Trickett, and then to the left, after Beach, who speedily bade him "good afternoon," and Pearce was presently left hopelessly in the rear. Trickett forged ahead on the northern shore, working in admirable style, whilst Beach, who is rapidly improving as an oarsman, pulled gamely along the northern shore, but was easily defeated in his attempt to draw up level with the champion. He is still much admired by his friends, who are deluded by a belief—yet unwarranted—that Beach disguised his strength, and that on Saturday he will, to quote their own expression, "upset Ned's apple-cart;" but persons who exercise an unbiassed judgment can scarcely join in that opinion. A great deal was written after the Hanlan-Trickett contest, comparing the style of the two, to the disadvantage of our champion, but the solitary critic who took exception to Trickett's rowing yesterday must indeed be fastidious. Anyone who witnessed his style must admit that, whatever he may have been on the Thames and in Canada, it is now perfection. He was congratulated by his friends on the steamboats, who very properly suppressed their applause out of sympathy for the one who was less fortunate.

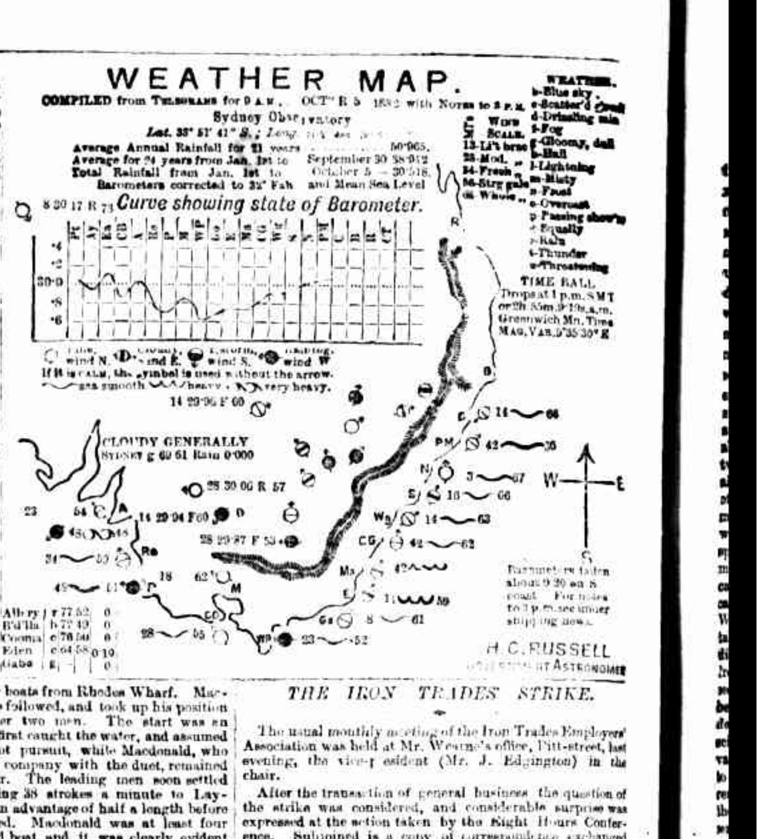

Up to this point in the proceedings there had been sufficient to compensate lovers of rowing, but the excitement of the day had yet to come. Promptly to the time fixed, Rush, Macdonald, and Laycock were in line; the Hibernian occupying the centre, Laycock the southern side, and Macdonald the northern. In their impatience to "be off," two of the competitors gently stole ahead, when the good-natured starter summoned them back a little farther. They were at their posts within the tick of a clock when Mr. Gratton signalled "off," and the three men applied their oars with exceptional vigour. Laycock shot ahead, being caught up in a moment by Rush. Macdonald soon fell into the rear, on account of the hot pace inaugurated by Rush, who apparently pushed Laycock as hard as he could, leading by half a length, which was increased now and again by a length. There were, of course, many who insisted that Laycock was the better man, and would presently pass his opponent and beat him easily; but when Laycock increased his efforts, Rush at once responded. The last half-mile of the course was done at a good pace, and at this stage Rush's extraordinary power was well demonstrated. Laycock put on spurts, and Rush followed the example with indomitable pluck, and this alone carried him through winner of the heat by three-quarters of a length.

Appended is a copy of our notes, taken during the race of the two divisions:—First Heat.—Course: From Gladesville Wharf to bathing-house, Charity Point. E. Trickett, W. Beach, and H. Pearce. The men faced the starter's flag punctually at the advertised time, but owing to the inconvenience caused by several steamers that persisted in passing across the boats, in defiance of the repeated calls to keep behind until the boats were started, some delay occurred in getting the competitors away. On the signal to "go" being given, Trickett took the lead, rowing 38 to the minute, whilst Pearce was doing 33, and Beach 36. Trickett hugged the south shore, Beach being close in to the northern side of the river, Pearce taking the middle of the stream; and owing to the boats being so wide apart it was difficult to say which was leading until Putney was reached. Here Trickett was four lengths ahead of Beach, while Pearce was struggling two lengths in the rear of the latter. Shortly afterwards Pearce was hopelessly out of the race; it then resulted in a mere procession between the other two boats, and Trickett, rowing leisurely in front of Beach, won by about 200 yards. Time, 18 minutes 44 seconds.

Second Heat.—Course: From Bathing-house, Charity Point, to Gladesville Wharf. M. Rush, E. C. Laycock, D. Macdonald. Rush and Laycock were first in readiness, having embarked in their boats from Rhodes Wharf. Macdonald shortly afterwards followed, and took up his position in a line with the other two men. The start was an excellent one. Laycock first caught the water, and assumed the lead with Rush in hot pursuit, while Macdonald, who seemed unable to keep in company with the duet, remained several lengths in the rear. The leading men soon settled down to work, Rush rowing 38 strokes a minute to Laycock's 32, who obtained an advantage of half a length before Uhr's Point was reached. Macdonald was at least four lengths behind the second boat, and it was clearly evident that the pace was too hot for him, and for the remainder of the distance he followed in the rear of the steamboats. Rush at the mile beacon led Laycock by half a-length, and although both men spurted several times no change took place in the positions of the boats, Laycock apparently having no desire to push Rush for the premier place. From this out the race requires no description, Laycock being beaten by half a length. Time, 17 minutes 21 seconds.

The final race will start at 4.30 p.m. on Saturday, and be rowed over the champion course.

ROYAL SYDNEY YACHT SQUADRON.

A general meeting of members of the above was held yesterday evening at the club rooms, Exchange-buildings, Mr. E. W. Knox (commodore) in the chair. The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed. It was arranged that races for second and fourth class yachts take place on November 18, third class on November 25. The date for the first class was not fixed. The following gentlemen were elected members of the club:—Messrs. Sydney A. Want, P. O. Williams, Q. L. Deloitte, and R. J. Black. Messrs. F. W. King and E. Smith were proposed as members.

The N. S. W. Rowing Association Regatta will take place on Saturday, 14th instant. A very good race is anticipated for the Sydney Mail Cup—the competitors being Messrs. Arthur, Batt, Gaden, and Thomson. The Maiden-oar Race will be competed for by crews from the various clubs. The Newcastle Club will not send a crew this season. The supremacy of the Royston College crew is acknowledged by all the other schools, as none are inclined to face the present holders of the Mayor's Cup.

Our Melbourne correspondent wires that the following scratchings for the V. A. T. C. meeting were posted to-day:—Caulfield Cup: Canary, Morpeth, John Peel, Robert the Devil. Caulfield Guineas: Morpeth. First hurdle race: Fusilier. Second hurdle race: Huntingdon. Toorak Handicap: Scandal, the Ghost, Lapstone, Robert the Devil.

FREE SELECTORS' CONFERENCE.

The delegates appointed to attend the Free Selectors' Conference, to be held in Sydney, met at the Town Hall yesterday, when the chair was occupied by Mr. John Gale, and 11 delegates were present.

The Chairman briefly stated the objects of the meeting to be the consideration of what might be considered the free selectors' platform, and also to appoint a central committee, who would attend to the promotion and protection of free selectors' interests. He also urged the delegates to impress upon their constituents the desirableness of unity of action in furthering their views, and he expressed his regret that they had not sufficiently done this hitherto. He concluded by saying it had been resolved that the subjects for the conference to discuss and decide upon should be as follows:—1. Abolition of auction sales other than town and suburban lots. 2. Abolition of sales in virtue of improvement purchases. 3. Abolition of interest. 4. Deposit on selection to be 1s. per acre, and balance to be paid in amounts of 1s. annually, and area to be increased to two sections. 5. That the residence condition on future selections be as at present, but each and every person purchasing such selection within 10 years from date of alienation from the Crown, be compelled to fulfil a residence of one year at least.

Mr. W. Brook, of Forbes, then moved,—"That this conference recommends the abolition of auction sales of Crown lands other than town and suburban lots."

Mr. J. M. Chanter seconded the motion.

Mr. P. Sandwall said he did not wish to move an amendment, but he thought there were some other lands than those named which should be included in the motion.

Mr. J. Grogan supported the motion, and pointed out that the sale of Crown lands by auction had materially depreciated the value of the public estate.

Mr. W. C. Wall also supported the motion, and pointed out that there were blocks of land which were not up to the minimum prescribed by the Act, which it would be rather difficult to deal with.

Mr. Howard said the society he represented would like to see the motion carried into law, because it would strike a blow at the monopoly of land.

Mr. P. Sandwall said that as it was desirable the system of peacocking land indulged in by squatters should be prevented, he would move the addition to the motion of the words "and areas under forty acres not adjoining unalienated land."

Mr. H. Levien, the secretary, seconded the amendment, as he also thought it would check peacocking.

Mr. Luscombe supported the motion and the amendment.

Mr. M. Tully said he would vote against the amendment, and Mr. Grogan said he would do so also, as he did not think lots of the area named could be easily found.

Mr. Brook opposed the amendment, believing it would lead to attempted evasions of the Land Act.

The amendment was withdrawn and the motion unanimously agreed to.

Mr. Sandwall moved,—"That, in the opinion of the conference, the sale of land to lessees in virtue of improvements should be discontinued." He said that in the Riverina district squatters had studded the land with huts and tanks, which they contended were improvements, with the view of evading the improvement conditions of the Act, but which were really of very little value, and could only be a means for dummying land and barring selection. He understood that one of these huts had been used six times for dummying purposes, and that it was quite unfit for human habitation. The squatter, however, had the audacity to contend that it was a bona-fide improvement, and they would find that this system of utilising huts in this way was rather general, and a very serious matter.

Mr. Brook pointed out that the particular hut referred to must have enabled the owner to illegally acquire 3480 acres of land.

Mr. F. W. Zweck seconded the motion.

Some of the delegates also said that it was well known that many of these huts were never inhabited, but were simply removed from one selection to another to enable the owners to increase the size of their holdings; and Mr. Grogan stated that some of the tanks constructed by squatters, and designated improvements, were not nearly as valuable as they were represented to be.

Mr. J. M. Chanter said that the huts were contracted for by scores; and although squatters charged £40 each for them, they were not worth that amount. The State was trebly imposed upon: first, in being deprived of its land illegally; secondly, in having to pay more for the huts than they were worth; and thirdly, in having to pay for useless tanks.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. John Howard moved—"That in the opinion of this conference, interest on conditional purchase balances should be abolished in favour of selectors for one area, or a number of areas not exceeding in the aggregate 640 acres." He contended that this would carry out the intentions of the Land Act of 1861, and would prove one of the greatest blows that could be struck at land monopolists.

The motion having been seconded,

Mr. A. Lynch, M.L.A., said that this proposal was a most difficult thing to deal with, and he feared that if it were accepted it was principally the capitalists and land monopolists who would benefit by it. If a particular date could be fixed for carrying it into effect, and if the selectors who had stuck to their land would be benefited, he would assist the conference in carrying it.

Mr. Howard said they did not desire that legislation in this matter should be for the past, but for the future.

Mr. Wall moved, as an amendment,—"That the interest be abolished, and all future payments be considered as instalments for the liquidation of the principal; that such abolition apply only to the conditional purchases that are or have been made the bona fide residence of the present owners, and that in no case shall abolition be granted to owners of more than the maximum allowed by the present or any future Land Act, and that abolition of interest date only from the passing of an Act dealing with such abolition, and that no such Act have a retrospective power to deal with moneys hitherto paid as interest."

Mr. Grogan seconded the amendment, and was proceeding to support it when it was resolved that, as the matter was of so grave a character it should be postponed for consideration until the following morning.

THE IRON TRADES' STRIKE.

The usual monthly meeting of the Iron Trades Employers' Association was held at Mr. Wearne's office, Pitt-street, last evening, the vice-president (Mr. J. Edgington) in the chair.

After the transaction of general business the question of the strike was considered, and considerable surprise was expressed at the action taken by the Eight Hours Conference. Subjoined is a copy of correspondence exchanged between the masters and representatives of the men, concerning a settlement of the dispute. The first is a letter from the Eight-hours Conference, as follows:—

"Westmoreland-street, Forest Lodge, October 2.

"Sir,—In reply to yours of the 30th September, I am instructed by the Eight-hours Conference of Iron Trades to communicate with you, and state that after an expression of opinion had been taken from the iron trades disputing with the Associated Employers re wages question, the conference have resolved that they will accept the second resolution mentioned in your letter of the 30th ultimo, viz., one penny per hour increase upon previous rate of wages to strike or lock-out forthwith, double time to be given for the first two hours' overtime, and special increase of one halfpenny per hour to be considered in three (3) months' time for leading hands; and further, the workmen will be prepared to resume work on Thursday, October 5, provided an agreement be signed between the Employers' Association and the Eight-hours Conference, embodying the above resolution, and that mention may be made that no workman shall suffer for any action he has taken in reference to the dispute, and we respectfully suggest that such agreement may be worded by your association, or we will submit one for approval. Trusting the matter may thus come to a proper settlement,

"I am, yours,
"D. Morrison, Secretary of the Eight-hours Conference of Iron Trades.

"To James Charles Pratt, secretary to the Iron Trades Employers' Association."

To this the following reply was sent:—

"Iron Trades Employers' Association, Sydney, 3rd October, 1882.

"Sir,—Yours of 2nd instant came duly to hand, and I enclose herewith a memorandum of agreement which will doubtless meet with approval. Our president is out of town, but the vice-president, Mr. J. Edgington, will sign the document in his stead, and I have arranged with him to be at his office—Atlas Works—to-morrow (Wednesday), at noon for the purpose. I shall also be present, and trust it will be convenient for you and the president of the conference to attend.

"I am, Sir, yours truly,
"Jas. Chas. Pratt, Sec.

"The Secretary Eight-hour Conference of the Iron Trades."

The memorandum of agreement above referred to is appended.—

"Memorandum of agreement entered into this 4th day of October, 1882, between the Eight-hours Conference of the Iron Trades of the one part, and the Iron Trades Employers' Association of the other part, whereby it is mutually agreed that workmen shall resume work on the morning of Thursday, the 5th day of October instant, on the following conditions, viz.:—They shall be paid at the rate of one penny per hour advance on the rates they were receiving on the 24th day of August—the day before they went out on strike—and in cases of overtime they shall receive double time for the first two hours. It is also understood that at the expiration of three (3) months from the 5th October the employers will consider a further increase of one halfpenny per hour for some of their leading hands. Further, the employers shall grant a general condonation to all men connected with the late dispute in the iron trade. As witness our hands from the day and year first before written."

The second letter from the eight-hours' conference, and the agreement submitted by the conference, printed below, show the position of affairs up to the time of the meeting of employers.

"Westmoreland-street, Forest Lodge, Sept. 3.

"Sir,—I am directed to inform you that, at a meeting of the E. H. Conference of Iron Trades, conjointly with the local district committee, held this evening, it was resolved that the fitters, turners, and blacksmiths do not resume work till the agreement is signed between the above bodies, conjointly, on the one hand, and the Iron Trades Employers' Association on the other. The agreement referred to will be sent you to-morrow (Wednesday), as soon as it is drawn up, which will be about midday. Trusting you will arrange so that the employers may meet and get it signed to enable the workmen to resume work on Thursday,

"I remain, yours, &c.,
"D. Morrison, Sec. E. H. C. Iron Trades.

"To Jas. Chas. Pratt, Sec. I. T. Employers' Association."

"An agreement made the day of October, 1882, between the Eight-hours Conference of the Iron Trades and Local District Committee of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, &c., on the one part, conjointly, and the Iron Trades Employers' Association, on the other part. Whereas disputes have arisen as to the amount of remuneration to be paid to men in the several branches of the iron trades, viz., fitters, turners, and blacksmiths, and a strike and lockout has taken place in consequence of such disputes. And whereas the said Employers' Association, on the 29th day of September, by way of settlement, offered, and still offer, the following terms to the E. H. Conference of the Iron Trades, viz., one penny per hour advance forthwith, double time for the first two hours' overtime, and special increase of one halfpenny per hour to be considered in three (3) months' time for leading hands. And whereas the said conference and committee agrees to accept the said proposal, subject, nevertheless, to the conditions hereinafter contained. Now, this agreement witnesseth that the said E. H. Conference and Committee, conjointly, and the said Employers' Association agree that one with the other of them, in the manner following, that is to say—1. The men shall resume work on the day of October instant, or so soon thereafter as may be agreed upon. 2. The wages shall be one penny per hour advance on the last scale of wages forthwith, double time for the first two hours overtime, and time and a half for the remainder of overtime; and a further increase of one halfpenny to be considered in three (3) months' time. 3. From and after the signing of this agreement no demands shall be made by the Eight-hours Conference and the local district committee of the Amalgamated Society, or the workmen in a body, for any increase of wages; nor shall the Iron Trades Employers' Association, or any firm or firms comprised in it, reduce the scale of wages without three (3) months' notice in writing. This clause shall not affect the special increase mentioned in paragraph two (2) of this agreement. 4. The Employers' Association, and the several firms included in it, shall not discharge any workman who shall, or may have made himself prominent, or taken an active part in the agitation for increased wages and the subsequent strike, for or on account of such participation in the agitation and strike as aforesaid; nothing contained shall be construed as limiting the right of an employer to discharge a workman."

A deputation from the Eight-hours Conference of the Iron Trades and the Local District Committee of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers called before the meeting separated, and declined to sign the agreement proposed by the employers, although strictly in accordance with their letter of 2nd instant, as above.

It was unanimously resolved by the employers that the agreement as drawn up by the association, and submitted to the eight-hours conference of the iron trades on the 3rd instant, be adhered to.

Business of the Suez Canal in War Time.—During the month of July the receipts of the Suez Canal show a considerable increase over those for the corresponding month in 1881; this in spite of the war and the subsequent dangers with which the canal has been threatened. For July, 1882, they were 4,500,000f. According to the official returns the sum is divided as follows:—1,400,000f. for the first 10 days, with 71 vessels, 1,148,000f. for the second 20 days, with 78 vessels, and 1,820,000f. for the third period, with 89 vessels. Last year the July receipts amounted to only 4,450,000f., with 237 vessels; and during July, 1880, only 155 vessels passed through the canal, for which but 3,225,000f. were paid to the company. The report further shows that during the first seven months of the present year 1960 vessels traversed the canal, producing a revenue of 36,500,000f., whereas during the corresponding period in 1881 the 1571 vessels which used it only produced 29,000,000f.; and the 1273 vessels which paid toll from January 1 to July 31, 1880, did not produce a revenue exceeding 24,500,000f.

OUR MELBOURNE LETTER.

MELBOURNE, OCT. 2.

The man at Hamilton who was suffering from something which the medical men could not agree to diagnose is dead. His death is a mere episode in the series of situations which have dramatically ranged themselves about his illness: but the determination of the question of what he died from is still unsettled, and likely to be unsettled. Dr. Youl continues to insist that the disease was chicken-pox. The two medical men who were first sent up from Melbourne, and the other medical men who followed them, and the local medical man who first saw the case, hold equally fast to the conviction that the case was one of smallpox. It is six on one side and one on the other side, and the public of Hamilton have held a meeting and have denounced all the doctors, all the police, and all the Government. The dead man has been buried twelve feet deep, and he had been made additionally harmless by quicklime. Taking a practical view of the case, it seems to me that it does not matter very much whether Wright died from variola or varicella, if what he did die of is a fatal disease and is likely to spread. Somebody has turned up an old book on medicine and has therein found a case very like Wright's case, and the author of the book (Dr. Heberden) calls it "malignant varicella." ergo it is insisted that Wright's case is malignant varicella. There is some talk of a conference of medical men to lay down the diagnostic law how to distinguish one of these diseases from the other. The difficulty in settling the dispute seems to be considerably, if not principally, in being able to say whether variola can originate de novo or not. One of the few really scientific men in the colony claims that variola may occur without the condition of a contagium to account for it, and that the factors exist around us ready, under favouring circumstances, to develop into the disease. There really seems nothing for it but to send out for an expert, full of the most recent knowledge on the subject, and to give him absolute power to pronounce, in every case. Certainly the more one reads about these exanthemata the less one seems to get at any really satisfactory explanation of them.

But all this is nothing new, and the perplexity arising from much knowledge is not confined to smallpox. Thus, yesterday, we had no water in Melbourne, and this morning there was a long account in the newspapers why we had no water. Substantially we were able to discover that it was in consequence of the bursting of a pipe somewhere; also, that it was in consequence of the bursting of several pipes; also, that it was on account of the reservoir at Preston being emptied, in order that a new valve might be fixed; also, that the water being let out of the reservoir, there was greater pressure in the pipes; also, that the taps did not run because there was no pressure in the pipes to make it run. It is so consoling to have much explanation, even when the explanation confounds us.

The process by which we can touch the money of the loan we are going to raise for railways long before we have actually floated it, has also been circumstantially explained. I have most carefully read the explanation, and I have tried hard to satisfy myself that I had it all made clear to me. But if I were to say, at this moment, that the explanation is clear, I should economise truth in a remarkable degree. I am aware that business men abuse scientific men for stating their propositions in technical terms, but no technicalities were ever more perplexing than those used to tell us how this four million loan is to be used before it is borrowed.

And I am equally bewildered on the subject of the joint-ownership of selections conveying to the possessors the right of voting in elections for the Legislative Council. I, and many thousands besides myself, thought this troublesome business was settled; and if I were on my oath at this moment I could not say if it is settled or still in debate. I have a private belief that it is not settled, and I have a perplexing doubt that after all it may be. The reason of the doubt is my having read a dozen leading articles explaining exactly how the matter stands. I am assured however, that the fate of the colony depends upon the settlement of the question, and, very naturally having an interest in the colony's welfare, I am anxious that things should be adjusted satisfactorily. And when I speak of myself I include, as I think, most other non-political persons dwelling hereabouts. But unless a man proposes to himself to become a member of the Legislature, he never seriously masters the political creed. Take Dr. Beaney for example. Dr. Beaney has issued an election address. As a confession of political faith, it is very complete; but when he first read it, he must have been greatly astonished at the extent of his political knowledge and the number of subjects upon which he had made up his mind. But this really is the mode of political education. In this part of the world, with the exception of your professional politicians, hardly anybody takes the trouble to ascertain exactly what the political situation is. And in the process of this education the pupil, like other pupils who go to school for the first time, gets a good many hard knocks. Dr. Beaney just now is getting more knocks than he finds pleasant, but he takes his punishment good naturedly, the more especially as the knocks he is getting are rather helping him than otherwise. For different men have different ways of achieving renown. Thus there is Superintendent Winch. Superintendent Winch is at present one of the most talked about men in the community, and all because he is said to have been in the habit of accepting loans from publicans. There is nothing in itself outrageous as against the common morals of society in a man borrowing money of an hotel-keeper; but then Superintendent Winch is not a common man, but a very superfine gentleman. He is a Melbourne Club man, and between the Melbourne Club and the Melbourne Hotel there is a great gulf fixed; that is, there has been supposed to be a great gulf. But this is an epoch of disillusions; so that if Mr. Winch should quit the force and open an hotel himself, nobody would be greatly astonished.

Indeed, it has come to be almost vulgar to be astonished at anything. There was a time, for example, when a quarrel between the Jesuit Fathers and the Christian Brothers would have been thought impossible, and yet it is one of the topics of conversation. These Christians, it seems, do not love one another. That legislators should fall out and call one another names is in the nature of things; and that detective policemen should revile one another in open court is demonstrated by current facts of the time. Also it is not uncommon for some reverend persons to display unholy animosities in their relations with each other; but it startles one a good deal to learn that a section of a religious body, whose habit it is to do their laundry work in the strictest privacy, should perform it in the sight of an irreverent public.

And in respect of reverend persons, one of them named Dowie has been perambulating Collingwood, proclaiming the iniquity of publicans, whom he denounces as poisoners. His object seemingly is to make himself notorious, and he is achieving this result abundantly. He is popular with the larrikins who do not love publicans, because publicans decline to supply them with liquor gratis. But the Rev. Mr. Dowie does not possess the confidence of his supposed order, nor is he in favour with total abstainers generally. He apparently carries on the denunciation business on his own responsibility. Another denunciator, whom I think you have had in your city, has come to Melbourne to show us what bad whisky we drink. But his efforts in this direction are quite needless. We know already that whisky of an exceedingly bad quality is extensively sold. The vendors of it are constantly fined, but they go on selling the whisky all the same. They can apparently afford to pay the fines because the profits of the sale are so considerable.

Also, the milk is much complained of. If this temperance apostle would investigate the adulteration of milk, he would do even more good than by giving his attention to bad liquor. And, going from fluid to gaseous bodies, he would do us a signal service if he would give his whole mind for a while to the question of illumination. For the gas is bad as a lighting agency: it is dear because the meters do not properly register the quantity consumed; and it blackens our ceilings and spoils our picture-frames. Consequently we are hoping for the success of the electric lighting company. They have demonstrated the possibility of using it for public buildings by the way in which they have lighted the Opera House with it. It is certainly there shown to have the advantage of gas, in respect of its steadier light, its freedom from heat, and its cleanness. And as it is said to be at least as cheap as gas, its preferableness is at once apparent.

The other good thing which this evangelist might take up would be the subjugation of the dust. The dust is the unchained Demon of this city, and does exactly as he likes. And he rages up and down as he likes, and nothing can control him. During the last few days he has had it all his own way, and the man who can subjugate him will deserve to have a colossal statue in bronze in the most public place in this city.

SURVEYORS' INSTITUTE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

Sir,—A bill for the incorporation of this institute has been before the Assembly for some time, and although some opposition to the passage of the bill has occasionally shown itself from the direction of the Government Survey Department, I have hitherto been content to disregard this opposition. From the peculiar phase which it has now assumed, and the strange tactics employed, I must ask you to give me a little space to correct the impressions which are likely to follow from the publication of the views which emanate exclusively from the opponents of the bill.

A few days ago a paragraph containing an extract from a petition was published in your paper purporting to be a statement of the objects sought to be gained by the introduction of the bill. In this paragraph only two clauses of the bill were quoted, and these were the only two clauses likely to develop anything in the shape of opposition. In quoting from a bill that is now under the consideration of the House, I think it is due to the public and the members of the profession who are scattered over the colony that the objects of the bill should have been stated, together with the nature of the powers sought for, and not have confined the quotation to the only two debatable clauses of the bill.

A few days after the publication of the paragraph above referred to the substance of a petition against the incorporation of the institute, and signed by 20 surveyors, was published in detail. At the time of this publication petitions had already been presented in favour of the bill, and signed by upwards of 100 surveyors. This fact was not quoted, and in addition to this omission, much that was set out in the prayer of the 20 petitioners was misleading and contrary to facts.

The first statement in the petition is very significant—that the motion to seek incorporation was carried by a majority of two out of a total of 24 votes. This, I believe, is true, but was the consequence of a meeting heavily packed by officers from the Survey Department, whose votes were set against independent members of the profession. It should have been stated, however, that this result was challenged by the official party, and that at a subsequent meeting we agreed to go to the vote again, not wishing to take advantage of a victory gained by so narrow a majority. On the second occasion the former result was confirmed by a large majority, and the action of the council of the institute was further ratified by appealing to the whole of the members of the institute, who supported the proposal to incorporate almost unanimously. Thus it will be seen that the statement that "the persons voting in favour of the Act do not represent the opinions of a large majority of the members of the institute" is directly contrary to fact.

Another reason for opposing the bill is that the society would be "placed in rivalry with the Survey Department." From this I gather that the Survey Department is in competition for professional work with the whole body of the profession in the colony, and if this is so I think no better reason could be furnished for the necessity of incorporation, for nothing is more fatal to the substantial progress of a colony than the interference of State departments with the actions of private bodies.

The petition further states that "we regard the Surveyor-General as the proper and natural head of our profession."

I can see no earthly reason why these 20 suppliants should be disturbed in this belief, but, on the contrary, am only too anxious to secure to every individual full liberty of thought and speech. I fail, however, to see any connection between this and the incorporation of the Institute, as the Surveyor-General would have placed himself at the head of our society only that he was prevented from ill-health.

Neither can I take any exception to the fact that the Board of Examiners to the Survey Department includes gentlemen of the highest professional attainments; but it is incorrect to state that the society wishes to transfer the functions of this board to our own council.

As the constitution of our institute is thoroughly representative, it is, I think, idle to make disparaging references to the professional status of its officers, who undoubtedly possess the confidence of a majority of its members.

The petition to the Assembly further sets out that it "would be desirable to obtain the opinions of the Surveyor-General and important officers of his department."

I may inform the petitioners that this has already been done by a select committee of the House, appointed for that purpose, and that the evidence obtained in this manner has been printed and laid before the House in the report of the select committee.

I cannot conclude without calling the attention of the public and the members of my profession to the extraordinary circumstance of the officers of a government department so far interfering with the rights of private citizens as to petition the Government against granting to a large body of professional men rights which are possessed by every other section of the community.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

Sir,—Permit me to ask for the insertion of the following remarks anent the publication in detail, in your issue of last Saturday, of a petition against the incorporation of the bill signed by 20 surveyors.

Besides this, last session, a petition of civil surveyors was also presented against the bill. I am desirous of giving those who oppose it the full benefit of all who object. This makes a total of 26. In contradistinction we have the Hon. Mr. Farnell presenting three petitions in favour of the bill, signed by no less than 121 members of the profession, being a majority of 95. A fourth petition has also been presented. It is signed by 73 prominent solicitors, auctioneers, land agents, and citizens, making a total of 194 in favour of the bill as against 26 signatures opposed to it.

Bearing in mind how the members of our profession are scattered to the remotest parts of the colony, it is significant that so many have agreed that incorporation is necessary. Touching the allegations contained in the petition signed by 20 surveyors, I may at once state that they are not in accordance with fact respecting the decision of the institute in favour of incorporation. It was decided by a majority, in face of a meeting largely represented by Government officers, to proceed with the bill. Nor was this sufficient for those who were in the majority. To obtain a thoroughly representative vote on this important question—to meet the wishes of the minority, though not so obliged—at a subsequent meeting it was decided by an overwhelming majority in favour of the bill. In contradiction to the statement "that an insignificant fraction of the total number of surveyors voted," I draw your attention to the fact that those opposed to the bill, after a lapse of 12 months, have succeeded in obtaining only 26 signatures, nearly all departmental. The statement "that the persons voting in favour of the bill do not represent the majority of the profession" is not in harmony with the fact that 121 members of the profession have, by their signatures, endorsed the action of those who voted in the majority. How can the action of a private body of professional men affect the interests of the Surveyor-General? It is absolutely untrue that it is contemplated to transfer the functions of the board of examiners from the Surveyor-General's Department to the institute. Hear what the Surveyor-General in his evidence said before the select committee when asked "Is there anything in the bill that would at all interfere with your prerogative as Surveyor-General, or with any regulations you may make in reference to examinations, or granting licenses to surveyors?" Answer—"No, this bill does not interfere with my prerogative." The statement "that the professional status of several of the gentlemen who are officers of the institute is not of a nature to inspire confidence in them as leaders of a corporation exercising control over nearly the whole of the surveyors in New South Wales," clashes with the fact that of the six licensed surveyors elected as officers, no less than four of them are now employed by the Surveyor-General. According to the Surveyor-General's evidence before the select committee, there are only 126 licensed surveyors working for the Department, whilst there are 132 actually on salaries—total, 258; so that the 121 members of the profession who are in favour of incorporation, represent a number almost equal to the whole of the licensed surveyors employed by the Government. I admit that the last two clauses are debatable. It has never been denied; but I submit that the bill in its entirety, if passed, is calculated to be of great benefit jointly with the public and the profession. But for the undue influence sought to be exercised in misrepresenting the object of incorporation, I would not have written. Here we have the extraordinary fact that a large body of intelligent professional men associated for their progress and welfare in seeking for incorporation to give legality to their proceedings, are met by the fractious opposition of a very small minority of the number in the craft. I am for one, as a member of the institution, glad that their recent movement has given me an opportunity of putting the dry facts of the case, through your columns, before the members of Parliament and the public of New South Wales.

BREAKERS AHEAD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

Sir,—Are the Sydney merchants asleep in allowing Victoria to euchre them in railway freight? They are bringing goods from Melbourne to Wodonga for Wagga at 30s. per ton all round, teams from thence to Wagga 40s. per ton, thus landing them at the latter place for £3 10s. per ton. The same goods cost from Sydney to Wagga £6 10s. per ton, or a difference of 60s. per ton in favour of Victoria. Trade must gravitate to Melbourne unless immediate steps are taken by your railway authorities to checkmate them. We want here to trade with our own city, but the difference is too great.

CITY COUNCIL.

A meeting of the finance committee of the City Council was held yesterday afternoon, in the council-room, there being present—His Worship the Mayor, Aldermen Hardie, Beare, Lees, J. D. Young, Meeks, Merriman, John Young, Carter, Withers, Chapman, and Dean.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

The following accounts were passed for payment:—City works, £1040 11s. 10d.; water works, £328 1s. 10d.; sewage works, £208 6s. 3d.

The following statement of the financial position of the Council for the week ending the 4th October was read:—City Fund, dr., £36,366 2s. 8d.; Water Fund, cr., £87,433 4s.; Sewerage Fund, cr., £17,912 12s. 9d.; Sydney Common Fund, dr., £13,112 2s. 5d.; cattle saleyards, cr., £15,993 14s. 3d.; Town Hall Loan Fund, dr., £886 0s. 10d. Bank balances: dr., £50,361 5s. 11d.; cr., £71,339 11s. Printed copies of the reports received from the Colonial Architect (Mr. James Barnet), from Mr. Edmund T. Blacket and Mr. G. A. Morell, architects, on the merits of the designs for the completion of the Town Hall, as prepared by the City Architect, were laid on the table. The Colonial Architect was of opinion that the requirements for the various purposes to which the building would be put had been fairly met, as far as the existing building and the limited area of the site at the western end would admit. He recommended that the right-of-way across the western end should be resumed, and pointed out a few defects and made suggestions. He thought there was too limited accommodation for an orchestra, and that the number of doors in the hall would be likely to interfere with its acoustic properties. For the same reason the ceiling of the hall, he thought, should be coved and formed of wood or other sonorous material, and the angles of the hall walls rounded for the like purpose. The detached columns in the hall, although giving great architectural effect and grandeur of appearance, would, he thought, to some extent obstruct the view and interfere also with the hearing. This, however, could be avoided by substituting pilasters, which would at the same time give more floor space, but at the sacrifice of the grandeur of appearance before alluded to, or the walls might be left entirely free, so as to admit of their being at some future time decorated in colour by mural paintings. The means provided for ventilation were, he considered, unsatisfactory, namely, by admitting fresh air by vertical tubes, open windows, doors, and fanlights, and the extraction of vitiated air, by the ceiling lights, which would interfere with the hearing, and in cold weather would produce draughts, unless the space around the hall is kept to the same temperature as that in the hall, and all fresh air heated; besides, windows and doors could not be kept open to admit fresh air in wet or dusty weather. He was of opinion that artificial means should be provided for extracting the foul or vitiated air at or near the floor, and greater provision be made for the inlet of fresh, pure, warm, or cold air, as the necessity arises, by vertical delivery, independent of doors or windows being opened, and that the gasaliers or means of artificial lighting be so placed as to be supplied with air from outside the building, irrespective of the hall supply. Provision should also be made for allowing a current of air to pass over the ceiling, under the roof, by side and end openings; the corridors, lobbies, and vestibule should be similarly ventilated and lighted. The places of convenience should be entirely isolated, so that a current of air might pass between them and the main building, and be otherwise thoroughly ventilated. Unless this were effected, the prevailing light westerly night winds would fill the corridors and hall with dangerous effluvia. The position of the kitchen would, he was afraid, from ascending odours, cause annoyance, and be offensive in the lobbies, corridors, and the great hall as well, unless much care is taken, which, however, might be avoided by having the kitchen on the upper floor. In conclusion, he stated that the design was architecturally in keeping with the existing portion of the Town Hall building, although of a less ornate character. Messrs. Blacket and Morell, in the main, approved of the design, taking a few exceptions which, however, would in no way interfere with the design as a whole. To these reports was appended one from Mr. Thomas H. Sapsford, the city architect, in which the following description of the proposed building and remarks thereon were given:—"I have repeated the external outline of the present building to the full extent of the ground, filling up the centre with a 'colonnade' in the basement; and introducing above three-quarter attached columns; the windows in each bay being merely treated with plain imposts and archivolts. By this plan I have the advantage of obtaining a copious flood of light into the corridors around the great hall, and also providing the best means for obtaining light to the lower hall through the 'colonnades.' The entrances are arranged on each side of the building (north and south) with 'porte cochère,' as indicated, 17 feet square inside with arches 15 feet wide. The steps to entrances are of easy rise and are divided into flights of about 12 steps each, with landings 13 feet wide between balustrades; these steps consist of two approaches, one on each side of the 'porte cochère.' The hall is entered on each side of the building (north and south); crush rooms are provided, together with ladies' cloak and retiring rooms, and gentlemen's cloak rooms. Immediately on entering the building, adjacent to both entrances, are staircases leading from basement to ground and first floors, to be constructed of fireproof material, 6 feet wide, with handrails on each side of stairs. The corridors are 9 feet wide, as will be seen on plan, extending all round the great hall and vestibule, forming a continuous 'promenade.' The sanitary arrangements are situated at the west end of the building, and are reached by leaving the corridor, through a doorway, on to an open balcony which leads to the premises referred to. I may here remark that, although actually attached to the building, the closets and urinals are virtually detached from the hall, and surrounded by a free current of air, and, by these means, cutting off the possible chance of any effluvia entering the building. Referring to the entrances to hall, it may here be mentioned that the front entrance will also be used, so that the building will have three grand entrances, each in opposite directions. The great hall itself will be 149 feet 6 inches x 61 feet 9 inches x 61 feet high, being about two cubes, which is the best proportion for a hall of this description. The hall runs east and west; at the east end is a gallery capable of seating 282; at the west end of the hall is situated the grand organ, with orchestra and platform capable of accommodating 400 performers. As the hall will not always be used for musical purposes, I have not thought it advisable to provide for more accommodation. In the event of special musical entertainments, the orchestra can always be temporarily enlarged, to accommodate any number of performers. The space under the organ and orchestra will be fitted up and utilized for retiring rooms, and for storing chairs, &c. Space will also be provided for hydraulic apparatus. The sides of the hall, as will be seen on referring to the plans, are divided into six bays, by double disengaged columns, with pilasters to correspond, treated in the Corinthian order with pedestal, entablature, and ordonnance. In each bay, on level with the floor, is a doorway to open outwards into corridors. Three doors of similar character are provided at east end of hall, opening into vestibule, making in all 15 exits from the hall. It will therefore be seen that every opportunity is taken advantage of in providing ample means of exit in case of emergency. Over each doorway in side bay a balcony is constructed, entered from corridors on first floor. These balconies form special features in the design, and are treated in the renaissance style, with recesses formed in wall, with independent Doric columns, and pilasters to correspond, having entablature, archivolts and keystones above. It will be observed that I have avoided unnecessary architectural embellishments, and have allowed ample room for the decorative artist at any future time. Some objection might be taken to the disengaged Corinthian columns, on the ground that they occupy too much space on the floor. This objection, however, is counterbalanced, firstly, by the grandeur of effect which these columns will produce; secondly, as being the means of breaking any echoes, and thus materially assist in perfecting the acoustic properties of the room; and thirdly, by acting in preventing the entrances being completely blocked up—a feature which so generally exists in places of amusement, and is so continually complained about. The whole of the walls and columns of the great hall will be finished in Keen's cement. The ceiling to the hall will be flat, consisting of six bays, each bay being divided into three panels, with bold mouldings, &c. The principal ribs dividing the bays will have moulded panels, with handsome bold brackets at each end. The centre panel in each bay will be constructed as a dome, with radiating sunk flutes, finished with bold mouldings. The domes will be fitted with gasaliers, and double tube ventilators for dispersing the vitiated air. The double tube ventilators, it may be remarked, will extend direct into the open air above the roof. The space in roof above ceiling will be kept cool by means of louvres extending nearly the whole length of roof on each side; as indicated on plan, openings will be made in walls above ceiling, so that a current of cool air will be kept passing and repassing over the ceiling. The louvres above referred to will be so constructed as to prevent the possibility of any driving rain having access to the upper portion of the ceiling. Gangways will be provided in roofs so as to allow of any repairs being carried out. The roof will be reached by means of a circular staircase at the end of hall on the first floor, as indicated on the first floor plan. Fresh air will be supplied to the hall by means of air shafts constructed under the ground floor, and running at level of basement ceiling from the exterior of the building on each side, thence by vertical pipes through pedestals of columns, and dispersed into the hall at level of the base of columns; the openings in the external wall will average at least 10 feet above the ground, which will supply a large quantity of fresh air. The whole will be so constructed as to allow of easy manipulation, and the regulation of the influx of fresh air. There will also be a series of small air gratings at level of floor. Regarding regulating the temperature of the air by means of elaborate machinery, as adopted in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, St. James' Hall, London, and others, I do not think it necessary to involve such an expenditure for such an object in this country. I have provided flues in the walls, so that, if necessary, Messrs. Boyle's patent downcast ventilators could be adopted. The hall is capable of seating 2172 comfortably, 3243 full, and 3500 crammed. Ample space is provided for a grand organ. The floor of the hall will be constructed with iron girders and concrete arching so as to be fire-proof. On top of the girders and concrete will be fixed bearers and floor boards. The ceilings of hall will also be constructed with iron. The roof will be independent of the ceiling, and will be of iron. It will therefore be seen that in the construction of the hall there is virtually nothing to burn. Referring to the area of light in the hall, I have increased the same since the plans have been inspected by the architects appointed by his Worship the Mayor to report upon them. I have also embodied other suggestions made by Messrs. Barnet, Blacket, and Morell. Referring to the suggestion of Mr. Barnet, in re coved ceilings, I cannot agree with him, as some of the best examples show that flat ceilings are used in the most successful halls in the world. It can also be pointed out that in some instances where coved ceilings are introduced, they have been comparative failures. On this point Messrs. Blacket and Morell agree with me, vide their report. The lower hall is of similar dimensions to the great hall, but only 18 feet in height. This hall could be utilised for banquets, bazaars, skating rinks, and ordinary meetings. In connection with this hall is a kitchen and scullery, in which special lifts will be provided for convenience in the event of the great hall being utilised for banqueting purposes. On the basement floor I have provided offices for the inspector of nuisances' department, turncock and water department, and assessors. Offices are also provided on ground and first floors for the other departments. Lifts are provided in the rear of the great hall from basement to first floor. Telephonic communication will be instituted between all the offices. Hose, with apparatus, will be fixed in different portions of the building, connected with tanks. I estimate the cost of the great hall, with corridors and surrounding offices, at £90,000. To finish the present building—viz., completing offices (first floor), council chamber, corridors, staircase hall, and staircase—as per plans submitted, will involve an expenditure of £12,665.

The designs were hung round the room, and were inspected by the aldermen present.

Alderman HARDIE moved that the reports be approved of and recommended to the council, and that tenders be called to carry out the design of the city architect. It would be necessary to consider whether the work would be divided into two tenders or remain only one. He did not pretend to be an architect or builder; but from the reports received upon Mr. Sapsford's work, it appeared to have met with approval, only one or two minor matters being objected to.

Alderman MEEKS seconded the resolution. He had carefully inspected the plans, and had read the report. There was only one thing he would like to see altered; it was the underground passage at the back; it would be far better if it were closed. Otherwise he much approved of the plans.

Alderman HARDIE said he had no objection to include in his motion that the right-of-way mentioned by Alderman Meeks be closed.

Alderman JOHN YOUNG thought it an extraordinary state of affairs to pass such a matter without full discussion.

Alderman MEEKS pointed out that the motion had only been moved, and the matter was then open to discussion.

Alderman J. YOUNG did not think the most had been made of the ground at the disposal of the council. The hall should have been bigger than it was in the design. They should have a hall that would accommodate 5000 or 6000 people. In the design he pointed out that by removing the side corridors and throwing them into the hall it could be made very much larger. Neither did he think there was room on the platform for a first-class organ. An organ in a limited space had a very bad sound. This defect of limited accommodation might be the fault of the ground, but he certainly thought some little additional room might be given to the organ. Neither would there be sufficient room for a large orchestra, unless it encroached on the body of the hall, which would be most undesirable. Also, the narrowness of the hall compared to its length was not a good feature. The Melbourne Town Hall was as 80 compared to 60 in the proposed Sydney Town Hall, and yet the former had been found none too big. He felt quite sure that 2500 would be the limit of people they could get into the hall, and he certainly thought more might have been made of the space at their command. There was an enormous waste of corridor space, which space, if taken into the hall, would enable it to hold 5000 or 6000 persons. This could be done, and he did not see why it should not be. Also the coupled columns might, he thought, as well be left out; unless they were made of proper material, they would be a sham; and if made of proper material, such as granite or marble, the cost would be very great. They would spoil the acoustic properties of the hall.

Alderman DEAN had inspected the plans very carefully, and with great satisfaction, and he confessed that he did not agree with Alderman Young. The city architect had not a new building to commence with, but he had to conform to the architecture of the former building, and adapt his designs to it. He (Alderman Dean) would be very glad if 2000 people could be got together in the hall, and thought it quite a sufficient number. He did not approve of so many people assembling in one place, because the accommodation, such as cloaking and retiring rooms, would never be found adequate to the demand for convenience and comfort. He thought the architect had done his work well. The great art in restoring old buildings in England was to grasp the original design of the work; and in his designs he thought Mr. Sapsford had done this most effectively. As to acoustic properties, admitting that there were recognised principles to be observed, yet that such properties were obtained in a building was to a great extent a matter of the locality in which it was built and good fortune. The architect had been crippled for want of space, and if it were found afterwards that the hall was too small, then they could build another hall in the southern part of the city, and have one the Northern Town Hall and the other the Southern.

Alderman CHAPMAN thought there was nothing unreasonable in Alderman Young's suggestion. They wanted a place in the city where a large number of persons could assemble. It was nonsense to talk of a Northern and a Southern Town Hall.

Alderman WITHERS, so far as he could judge, thought that the aldermen had had very little time to look into the designs and think over the matter. These designs had been exhibited on festive occasions, but, with these exceptions, they had been in the office of the city architect, where aldermen had little necessity to go. It would be well to leave them on exhibition, as they were, for some little time further. He himself was a little disappointed at the area of the hall. It had been a matter of regret in the city for some time past there was no large hall in it, and any suggestion to enlarge this hall was one which ought to be entertained. As to distributing halls all over the city, that was ridiculous. He would be in favour of any motion which would give aldermen further time to consider the plans.

The MAYOR said the designs had been in his room for the last three weeks, and could at any time previously have been seen in the city architect's office.

Alderman J. D. YOUNG would be glad to fall in with the suggestion of Alderman J. Young if the city architect thought it could be carried out.

The CITY ARCHITECT, who was present, said that he had had in view the suggestion thrown out by Alderman J. Young, but he found that he could not get the room to carry it out properly; and if it were not properly done, it would throw the whole hall out of proportion. His design was correct as to the size of the hall under the circumstances. He had studied the matter, and he could not see his way to make it larger. The proportions admitted by all architects to be observed in halls of this description were that it should be two cubes, and this hall had been so designed.

Alderman J. YOUNG said there were very few halls of double cubes. The Town Hall in Melbourne was not. He still thought they ought to have a hall to seat 5000 persons, and was quite sure there was the ground to build a hall to hold such a number. He defied any alderman in Sydney to ask nine out of ten architects, and not have a majority that would say they could have such a hall without any more ground.

Alderman WITHERS did not think it would involve any great additional expense.

Alderman J. YOUNG said it would not add £2000 to the total cost.

The MAYOR pointed out that it was most necessary not to destroy the acoustic properties of the hall. It was believed that the proportion of the double cube was the best for a hall to be devoted to singing and speaking; and the question was whether if they broke this proportion and made the hall larger, they would not destroy this property. The hall would not be so much for public meetings as for concerts; and if its acoustic properties were destroyed it would be of little use for that purpose.

After some further discussion it was determined to postpone the matter for one week, when Mr. Sapsford will have ready a pencil plan of the suggested larger hall.

Alderman HARDIE moved that it be recommended to the council that tenders be called for the completion of the present building.

The motion was seconded and carried.

A report was read from the city engineer, stating that he had visited the fire-plug in Kent-street the day after the late fire. He found the plug legibly indicated on the kerbstone, the plug itself being distinctly displaced and uncovered. The real cause of delay consisted in the time taken to empty it of road metal thrown by mischievous children into the plug case. There were six turncocks, and men whose duty it was to visit the plugs periodically. The man whose duty it was to attend to this plug stated that a few days previous to the fire he cleaned it out, and left it in perfect order. The turncock was free of all blame.

Just previous to the closing of the meeting Alderman Carter gave notice that he intended to move, at the next council meeting, that the resolution moved by Alderman Playfair, and carried at a council meeting, that the city solicitor be instructed to defend the action brought by Alderman John Davies against the Mayor for slander be rescinded.

The MAYOR said that the resolution having been carried, it could not be rescinded.

The committee then adjourned.

THERE IS ENOUGH RACKET IN THE HOUSE in the day time without having the quiet of evening disturbed by a noisy clattering sewing-machine, though it may be the famed so-and-so's make, but noisy for all that. The general remark of those who first see the AUTOMATIC SILENT at work is, "How quiet!" The principle that these are made on does away with the possibility of noise, and being automatic or self-adjusting in their tension, they are so simple that a child can work them, and they will not wake the baby in the evening, which is a great object to some folks as well.
HEBBLEWHITE and CO., Agents for the Willcox and Gibbs Automatic Silent Sewing-machine, 416, GEORGE-STREET.

RICHARDSON and WRENCH have received instructions from the HOLT-SUTHERLAND ESTATE LAND COMPANY, LIMITED, to sell by public auction, at the Rooms, Pitt-street, on MONDAY, 9th OCTOBER, at 11 o'clock, KURNELL.

This GRAND WATERING PLACE has the advantage of fertile soil. Its streets are wide. It is only sparsely timbered. Its contour is graceful, and it slopes away to the silvery beach, along the entire extent of which is an Esplanade, called "THE PRINCES' PARADE."

Nearly the whole of the water frontage of Port Jackson has been secured by private owners; and it is but here and there the public enjoy the advantage of a few score feet which they can call their own on the margin of the harbour. About Sydney water frontage is offered for sale only on rare occasions, and then, at prices ranging from ten or twenty to hundreds of pounds per foot. In years to come similar prices will no doubt be obtained for water frontages in the Marine TOWNSHIP of KURNELL, and the augmentation of value will be all the greater, because the directors of the HOLT-SUTHERLAND ESTATE LAND COMPANY, Limited, have arranged for the magnificent Esplanade, which will give the advantage of water frontage to every purchaser of land in this splendid subdivision.

The company have not had KURNELL cut up into small portions, each containing a few feet frontage, but have had it surveyed in areas of from TWO to FIVE ACRES, so that each purchaser may have enough to subdivide, and, in years to come, live upon one portion rent free, while deriving a considerable annual revenue from subleasing the remainder.

The land immediately to the north-east of the new TOWNSHIP of KURNELL, and KNOWN AS CAPE SOLANDER, has RECENTLY BEEN PROCLAIMED A PUBLIC RESERVE. Not very far distant is the magnificent NATIONAL PARK. In front Botany Bay lies like an azure shield, and at the rear ebb and flow the waters of the Pacific Ocean. All the surroundings of KURNELL are grand, and the new township is so admirably situated that it can never be defiled by insanitary conditions.

Attention is particularly directed to the terms on which this land is to be allotted. Purchasers will not be called upon to invest large capital. They will buy a lease for ninety-eight years—equal to a freehold for three generations, and the only cash required will be the rent fixed at auction. This half-yearly rent will not be increased periodically, as is the case in regard to Government leases, but the price bid by successful purchasers will determine the amount of each half-yearly payment during the whole term. And there will be NO BUILDING CONDITIONS. That the land is at present little known will be all in favour of the buyers, who will stand to win the unearned increment which will accumulate as the city and colony grow in population and in wealth. With railway and tramway extension, a steam ferry to the Botany tramway, and the probability of coal (for which the Company is about to bore) being found on the Estate, it is impossible to foretell what will be the increased value of these five-acre blocks in a few years. The Company have resolved, however, to dispose of the leases to the highest bidders on the 9th October, and to allow them to share in their good fortune. It is a special advantage that purchasers will not come under any building conditions. They can build or not as they choose, and subdivide the land as they please, subject only to the proviso that no street or right-of-way shall be less than a chain in width.

To Yachtsmen, to Investors, to Speculators, and to persons who desire to secure sites for Marine Villas in situations the most beautiful and on terms the most favourable, an opportunity is offered such as has never before been presented since the eyes of the public have been opened to the value of metropolitan land, and especially to the superiority of areas possessing the advantage of water frontage. A tramway now runs from Sydney to Botany Bay; steamboats already ply from the Government Wharf, near the tram terminus, to various points on the shores of Botany Harbour and George's River. Thus in a few years access to the city from KURNELL will be as easy as is now the trip from North Shore to the General Post Office. When that time shall arrive, what will be the annual value per foot of the land which is now about to be offered in Five-acre Blocks.

LITHOGRAPH PLANS are now ready for distribution.

WHY BUY LEASEHOLD LAND at ST. JAMES' GLEBE, WAVERLEY?
Because on NEXT SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, HARDIE and GORMAN will sell 119 SPLENDID BUILDING ALLOTMENTS on lease for the UNEXPIRED BALANCE OF 99 YEARS.
Because the land is very close to the city.
Because the tramway passes the land.
Because a twopenny tram ride and a few minutes' walk will take you from the city to the land.
Because the land is within walking distance of the city.
Because this is one of the very few original subdivisions near the city in which it is now possible to buy.
Because there is risk in investing in land at a distance from town, but securing land adjoining the city at a reasonable price must certainly prove a profitable investment.
Because a very small payment will secure land on which buildings may be erected at once.
Because the land is bounded on south and east by the SYDNEY COMMON, on the west by the valuable MILL HILL ESTATE, and on the north by the WAVERLEY-ROAD.
Because the splendid views from many of the lots can never be built out.
Because it is just the land to suit builders; houses on it would certainly let or sell well.
Because the vendor has secured this Church Glebe at a very low figure, and will sell at a low figure.
Because many builders and working men have made large profits by judiciously selecting leasehold building plots.
Because this land may be secured close to the city, without paying city prices.
On the Ground, NEXT SATURDAY, October 7, at 3.30 p.m.
